Some tips to prepare for a remote shoot

Our summer calendars are brimming with city functions and family community events to be televised. As you prepare, it is es-pecially helpful to have a basket of information that you always take on a remote shoot.

on a remote shoot.

Here are some of the elements that are important for any show when you go on location:

Confirm the plans to videotope several days ahead of time.
 Confirm the plans the day be-

Continuo de permission dilowing you to be at a particular location to cover the event — carry this with you.

Have your crew wear name tags.

• Bring along filers made up to Iring along iters made up to promote your abow.

 Make arrangements for meals for your crew ahead of time.
 Include a first aid kit, an umbrella, sunvisors and thermos of water with ice cubes.

Bring enough extra technical supplies, such as video tapes, backup power supply, duck tope and roping to block off the orea.

where you are going to set up your equipment.

It has been our experience to note that whenever the television crew arrives, excitoment prevails. If at all possible, have a crew member be your information person. The rest of the crew can point that person out to the questioning resident and let him/her spend the time rather than take away from the concentration of the technical crew member.

Every time one of our television crews goes out, it is an opportunity to share experiences with curious friends and neighbors. Having a person specialized for this conversation is important. We have brochures explaining our workshops as well which you may take slong.

Remember, upon concluding your taping day, clean up the site and remember to say good-bye to your hoat. A follow-up note letting the nuttorizing person know what you are going to be doing next is very important. This will help eliminate a lot of questions and saniety, as you take pastproduction time to perfect the show.

Good luck — think summer and remember to keep that equipment out of the sunshine and reln.
