Jarmusch and Rafelson lose their touch with latest films

JOHN MONAGHAN

Two of America's most idiosyncratic directors have new movies out this week. And both, for the most part, flop at the very quick pace that made them famous.

Jim Jarmusch's "Night on Earth," playing for a second weekend at the Detroit Film Theatre, revolves around an irresistible premise. Five stories are set in five different taxi cabs in five different cities on one ordinary night.

The first segment, set in Los Angeles, stars the film's most recognizable performers, Winona Ryder and Gena Rowlands. It's also the least inspired, a hackneyed story about a movie casting agent who thinks she has found something real in the tomboy taxi driver who shuttles her from the airport.

Rowlands is great as usual as a woman completely controlled by her high-powered position.

"Of course, I'm hysterical," she says to her colleague over her ever-present cellular phone. "You just can't tell it right now."

Still, Jarmusch works better with scruffy non-actors, especially musicians like Tom Waits, John Lurie and even Screamin' Jay Hawkins, who brought a sort of pop reality to the director's car films. A famous actress like Ryder seems out-of-place in Jarmusch's world.

The bits that follow are strictly hit-and-miss. Roberto Benigni, so memorable in Jarmusch's "Down by Law," logs the movie's best performance as a cable who decides to confess his sordid sexual history to the priest he picks up. There's another predictable and hokey end to this 20-minute ride.

And this is the main problem with "Night on Earth." Like them or not, Jarmusch's previous films have been true originals. For some reason, he feels compelled in this one to deliver preachy situation comedy just like every other Hollywood director.

His visual style remains intact, however. The color is gorgeous and he does evoke the mood of various cities, from New York to Helsinki, in establishing shots that are works of art in themselves. A wall of clocks set for different times on earth cleverly link the various sequences.

"Man Trouble," meanwhile, reunites Jack Nicholson and Bob Rafelson, the actor/director team behind "Five Easy Pieces" and "The King of Marvin Gardens." I looked forward to seeing Jack's eyebrows in action in a small picture where he could play a regular Joe.

Get ready for another disappointment. "Man Trouble," despite the best efforts of Nicholson and co-star Ellen Barkin, never strikes the right comic chord. It's an embarrassing right from the animated credits, which sets up the film's tasteless running gag about a German shepherd who rides on any available leg.

Jack plays an attack dog trainer who sells "piece of mind" to an opera singer (Barkin), plagued by threatening notes and phone calls. He takes a special interest in her predicament and charms her out of her neurotic shell.

"Man Trouble" offers this paper thin plot as a springboard for what should have been inspired bits of character chemistry. Harry Dean Stanton and Beverly D'Angelo round out the talented cast in amusing takeoffs on Donald and Ilyana Trump, but everyone labor for the same price that ignited earlier films.
