Clubhouse from page 1A

Cummins' architect, Michael Boggio of Birmingham, said the current plan makes the building smaller than an original plan for a more than 7,000 square-foot clubhouse. "The footprint of the building has been reduced substantially," he said.

The top floor of the clubhouse would feature a 2,400-square-foot restaurant with seating for about 120-125 people. A kitchen, lounge, bathrooms and offices also would complete the top floor. A separate maintenance building also would be built.

The lower floor — essentially a walk-out basement — would feature a pro shop, small golf storage and golf cart area. Overall, the building offers about 4,000 square feet of usable space, Boggio said. Charest told the council that "this venture" needs a clubhouse with a liquor license. Without a license, course owners would probably build a small building for a pro shop. The owners, he said, understood they would have a restaurant and bar.

Marks said that the PRD agreement speaks of a clubhouse but there is no mention of the type, size or the need for a liquor license. "It just said there shall be a clubhouse,"

Despite continuing complaints about golf balls hitting homes, particularly near the 6th and 7th fairways, some neighbors seemed supportive of a clubhouse and liquor license.

"The success of the golf course will enhance our property values," said Richard Lark, a member of the Fairways of Copper Creek Condominium Association, which represents the largest number of owners in the development.

Lark told the council that members expect a clubhouse, which they can use, as promised in the planned residential development agreement.

In fact, in a letter to the council from the Fairways association, members questioned whether 4,000 square feet on the main floor was adequate.

Other neighbors, such as Edward Gerber, however, still want to know why no special provisions have been made for residents, whose open space is the golf course. Signs are up apparently warning residents not to walk along golf cart paths, according to neighbors.

"Where is ours," asked Mariette Simon, referring to open space for residents.

Simon in particular questioned the use of Copperwood Boulevard, a private road off 12 Mile into the development, as access to the clubhouse. "I think it would only be fair for the owners to contribute to the maintenance of that roadway."

Another neighbor argued for an additional route out of the development, particularly for emergency situations. "I don't see how you people can allow us to be trapped without an emergency exit."

City Manager William Costick said it was determined that it would be safer to maintain only one exit entrance onto 12 Mile. An emergency exit to the development is expected to be built in the next construction phase, he added.

Joyce Klinger, who supports construction of a clubhouse with a liquor license, also questioned the city council on their seeming lack of knowledge that plans for new houses in the development have been changed.

A couple hours into the discussion, the council decided there were too many unanswered questions to make a decision. Some also regretted that the city council years ago didn't look closer at the PRD agreement, particularly pertaining to the golf course that was bought by the Cummins brothers in 1991.

OU approves performing arts major program

Implementation of a new performing arts major in theater and dance has been approved by the Oakland University Board of Trustees.

The Aug. 12 action authorizes the major within the existing Bachelor of Arts program in the College of Arts and Sciences.

University officials say the program responds to student demands and will provide quality instruction in interdisciplinary courses and in the 28-credit dance or theater specializations to be selected by each student.

The board also approved phasing out a number of non-major offerings at the undergraduate and graduate levels so resources can be reallocated for a high quality performing arts major. Implementation begins Sept. 1, 1992.

University officials say the actions followed a comprehensive program review by the Department of Music, Theater and Dance in collaboration with the College of Arts and Sciences Planning Council.
