Windows open house to natural setting

The Deerhorn is a house marked with a private front and a richly windowed back.

The eating nook, great room and master suite have glass that fills nearly twice the space as the walls and offer a panoramic view of the natural environment.

The huge central living area could be outfitted as a family room or sectioned off as dining room and living room, depending on family preference. Behind the pellet-burning woodstove, which is seated on a large hearth, the clipped corner is lined with brick that holds and radiates heat long after fires have turned to ash.

Abundant counter and cupboard space wraps four sides of the large country kitchen. The counter that separates the kitchen from the nook serves as a buffet when needed and could be outfitted as an eating bar. Potted plants flourish in the narrow garden window.

A small step-in pantry is located in the passageway to the two-car garage, across the hall from a comfortably large utility room with simple counter space for folding clothes. If the Deerhorn is built over a basement, stairs would go between the pantry and the garage. Or the space could house a broom closet or expanded pantry.

Storage space lines the hall way to the bedrooms, all located at the left end of the room. A bay window adds elegance to the master suite, which has a walk-in closet, oversized shower and a second vanity in the dressing area. The other two bedrooms share a bathroom with combined tub and shower.

Odd angles are another feature of the Deerhorn. The breakfast nook is a semi-octagon, and only the utility room is totally rectangular.

The overall dimensions are 60 by 54 feet for 2000 square feet of living space. The garage is 545 square feet.
