BITS AND PIECES

Matt Dillon's back in the saddle; NBC nurtures The Mommies

There oughta be a law. James Arness is currently filming a new movie-for-television in the high desert of Santa Fe, N.M. Arness reprises his role as Marshal Matt Dillon, which he played for 20 years on the CBS series Gunsmoke. After three other movie outings as the marshal, each of which sank in the ratings like a tall man in quicksand, it seems ludicrous to make a fourth telefilm along the same lines. Nevertheless, James Brolin and Ali MacGraw will join Arness for Gunsmoke: The Last Ride, to be broadcast later this season on CBS.

The most excellent director Penelope Spheeris, whose last film, Wayne's World, earned more than $120 million at the box office, recently took on two new jobs with Fox. First she will produce and direct a TV comedy series titled Danger Theatre. Spoofing action-adventure shows such as Miami Vice, each episode contains two parody segments and will feature Peter Graves (Mission: Impossible) as host. Spheeris will next take the helm of a big-screen adaptation of the '60s sitcom The Beverly Hillbillies. While no casting has been announced for the big-screen rags-to-riches-with-riches story, part of the plot deals with the marriage of widower Jed Clampett.

On the lighter side, NBC is launching the network career of the stand-up comedy duo The Mommies (Marilyn Kentz and Caryn Kristensen), whose act looks at the realities of life as a wife and mother in the '90s. The Mommies claim most of their material stems from their own experiences.

The network is sparing no effort in paving the way for the pair's upcoming prime-time series. In addition to arranging appearances on The Tonight Show With Jay Leno and other network venues, NBC will air a series of one-minute, prime-time vignettes called "Mommie Moments."
