Levinson forces whimsy in 'Toys'

If "Toys" really was a toy instead of a movie, it wouldn't be the kind of imagination-inspiring wind-up that the movie hones. It would be a slickly packaged, but cheaply made plastic doo-doo that looks great in the ads but breaks within minutes of being the box.

Barely Levinson's latest stars Robin Williams as a second-generation toy manufacturer at odds with his military-minded uncle. The three-star general inherits operations at Zevos Toys at his brother's deathbed and immediately starts to produce a new breed of war toys.

No ordinary G.I. Joes, these tanks, jets and helicopters carry actual explosives and can be flown via remote-control to enemy military installations via unsuspecting kids on video game. He hopes to impress "The Washington Boys" with the concept of a cost-saving mid-life military.

Williams is cast as Leslie Zovo, a delightful sight in a bowler hat who refuses to grow up. He has trouble standing up to the general, however, who has no compassion for the company's creed that toys should inspire kids to create and not destroy.

The comedian is surprisingly restrained here, wisely realizing that what this movie doesn't need is more flamboyance. He gets wound up once in awhile, with his best moments coming in esides, including one about "F.A.O. Schwarzkopf" when he witnesses the deadly potential of his uncle's arsenal.

Good must triumph over evil, but a climactic battle between wind-up toys and the military ones is pathetically done, filmed in a grainy slow-motion effect that might have been effective in a real war movie but not here. As with most of "Toys," I was embarrassed for almost everyone involved.

And there is talent here. As Williams' sister, Joan Cusack works in the paper doll department and insists in modeling life-size versions of her designs. Her dresses have flat fronts and backs, with square fold-over tabs peaking up from the shoulders. But even her good work is threatened by the heavy hand of writer/director Levinson.

Levinson is one of Hollywood's most popular directors, but you have to go back 10 years to "Diner" to find a film that really accomplishes what it set out to do (you've seen "Robin Man.")

There's nothing worse than forced whimsy, except for maybe preachy forced whimsy. Levinson blamed television for the breakdown of the American family in "Avalon." Here, he lectures about military toys and video games, a valid message perhaps, but one delivered with all the subtlety of a Sherman tank.

He has compiled a film with top-notch designers, technicians and actors, but he doesn't have a vision strong enough to bind it all together. The costumes and set design are imaginative in the film's opening Christmas pageant, with kids dressed up like tree ornaments and gingerbread men, but you can't help waiting for something irreverent to chop through all that goofy frosting.

Simply put, Levinson doesn't have the touch. He doesn't know when to wax cute or insightful or when to just plain shut up already. I hope there aren't many gifts like "Toys" underneath your Christmas tree.

Never grow up: Robin Williams plays Leslie Zovo, a second-generation toy manufacturer at odds with his military-minded uncle, in "Toys."
