BABY TROT? YES, AND SINGLEFOOT!

Crawling Infants Don't Pace
Like Dogs and Cats.

Baltimore, Md.—Crawling babies do not pace, they trot. This disputed point has at last been shown by the camera, with the co-operation of a group of babies, at the psychological laboratory of Johns Hopkins university.
Babies from six months to seventeen months old, a cat, and a bulldog were the subjects in the demonstration of walking technique. Each baby in turn was placed on the floor in front of it a celluloid doll, a red rubber ball, or a shiny watch was dragged alluringly by a string, and as the baby set out after the toy, the camera scratched its pictures.
Reports of the experiment, just reported by Dr. Lenoir H. Burdette, show that babies are much more individual in their ways of getting around in the world than older people are. Speaking generally, a human being's first attempts at locomotion are merely struggling forward with much floundering and waving of arms and legs.

Later, the baby's arms begin to work, left, right, in alternating rhythm, while his legs are still dragged or hitched after him in most unorthodox fashion. Then he begins to carry his abdomen clear off the floor, and at last he develops a left, right motion of his legs, alternating them with his arms.
The dog and cat moved along the floor in a pacing gait, the weight of the body being borne by the two legs on one side, and then by the two legs on the opposite side. But all of the babies trotted, keeping their weight balanced diagonally between a leg on one side and an arm on the other, though some of the younger crawlers singlefooted.

Not a Hospital Case

John Armour, slated for jury duty at Mt. Vernon, N. Y., limped into court 15 minutes late and was rebuked for being tardy. "Well," said the juror, "I got hit by an automobile and broke my leg." The court was sorry. Hadn't he better go to a hospital? Armour thought it would me all right if he could get some sticker tape. Some was procured. Seated in a chair, in full view, Armour solemnly pulled up his trousers leg and revealed his broken leg. The judge led the relieved laughter, for the leg that was being repaired was wooden.

The Sleep Of Ease

Sleep is the rebuilding time. In this time of repose the body acquires enough energy to carry it through the rest of the day.

Restless Sleep
Drains Energy

Nervousness spoils sleep. But chiropractic calms the nerves by readjusting the spinal column that guards the nerve cords.
