

Y. M. C. A. COMMITTEE WILL CONFER WITH LOCAL MEN

At a recent meeting of the Royal Oak Township committee of the Lower Oakland County Y. M. C. A., a committee consisting of M. F. Cole, C. C. Bradshaw, and A. B. Struthers, was appointed to confer with similar committees from Birmingham and Farmington, in regard to matters of relationships, budgeting, and secretarial supervision. This step has been necessitated by the growth of the communities involved, and the development of "Y" work in the communities.

A campaign of friendship, in which older boys are assisted in choosing a vocation by personal interviews and forum discussions, was endorsed.

PICTURES OF WALLED LAKE BOYS APPEAR IN A GERMAN NEWSPAPER

Two Walled Lake boys were pictured in a newspaper in a German city recently. A snapshot of Masters Bobby Buffmyer, son of Mr. and Mrs. Glenn Buffmyer and Ernest Bramick, son of Dr. and Mrs. Fritz Bramick, was sent by Mrs. Bramick to relatives in Germany.

The picture was turned over to a newspaper. A copy of the paper was mailed by Mrs. Bramick to Mrs. Buffmyer recently.

MALCOLM TO RETIRE AS SUPERVISOR AFTER 17 YEARS OF SERVICE

After seventeen years of service to Commerce Township as Supervisor, Frank J. Malcolm has definitely decided to retire with the expiration of his present term. The condition of his health during the past year has made it advisable for him to relinquish some of his many and varied duties.

The growth of the township while Mr. Malcolm has been Supervisor provides an interesting story. He started in as a young man, when descriptions of property were simply contained in one book, and his salary was $300. Descriptions now require six books, and the Supervisor's position is one that requires a great deal of time and attention.

Supervisor Malcolm is on four committees of the Board of Supervisors, the salary, auditor general's report, and Court house site committee. He is also director of a Pontiac bank, president of the Monitor Insurance Company and administrator of several estates.

He was Chairman of the Board of Supervisors for four years, taking the position the first year to fill the vacancy in the absence of the elected Chairman because of the latter's illness and filling the capacity in a manner that returned him to the chair for three additional years.

Mr. Malcolm has lived all his life in Commerce Township, having been born a mile and a half east of the Village of Commerce. He was Township Treasurer and School Inspector, preceding his election as Supervisor.

Mr. Malcolm will not retire completely, but his many other duties will keep him occupied.

A compliment always passes for more than its face value.

Rachael and Her Renunciation

By H. IRVING KING
(Copyright.)

RACHAEL—ANSTRUPHERS and Marjorie Clifton were the best friends in the world. Nothing would ever cast a cloud upon their friendship.

But something did and that something was a young man, John Rathbun, a youth possessed of that rare combination, money and brains. Such a combination is attractive; all the girls set their caps at John. But when Rachael came on the scene the others had no chance.

At first Marjorie was all smiles and congratulations when her friend over the conquest she had made of the much-sought-after John. "Nonsense," said Rachael, "he doesn't care any more for me than he does for you. In fact, I think he is a little more attracted to you. Why, we are almost always together when he calls. And besides, you have that delightful Robert Emberley devoted to you. Anyway, I'm going to take up sentiment with the rest of the world."

Thus she spoke, but she didn't really mean a word of what she said. She had been flattered at first by the attentions of John Rathbun—only flattered. Then the truth had come to her in that stinging breast-aching feeling. She did not dare to catch it, but she feared—and hoped it was—

As Rachael spoke in her light, bantering manner she seemed to possess the face of Marjorie. She sat silent for a minute, her eyes fixed vacantly, then sighed and said: "Ah, Rachael, you cannot deceive me with such idle words. No, no, don't put your arm around me. I cannot bear it now. It is not your fault; but let me alone."

Rachael sat thoughtful and sorrowful after Marjorie had gone. "She is in love with John, too," she thought, "and perhaps, if we were not for me, he would marry her. He likes her, I know he does, he told me so. And I suppose I ought to give him up to her."

Rachael passed a wretched night. Several times she brought herself to the point where she resolved to make the great renunciation; and then thought of John again and cried out that he belonged to her and to none other. At times she almost hated Marjorie for daring to love him, too. But she would have a talk with Marjorie—a long, frank talk—and then she would see. The next afternoon she went to Marjorie's house and found her working in her garden, a flower herself amid the other flowers—she was tending. She looked so sweet, so pretty, so delicate, it sent a pain through Rachael's heart to think that this young, fair creature must have her whole life blighted through hopeless love. And she, Rachael, had the power to avert such a doom from her.

Yes, she must make the renunciation. It would be like tearing her heart out; but she must do it and try and find some compensation in the knowledge that she had made her friend happy though she lost happiness forever herself.

"Come with me a moment, Marjorie," said she, "I have something important to say to you." And putting her arm around the waist of her friend she led her to a little rustic summer house. Marjorie, all the while, prattling about her flowers and calling on Rachael to admire them.

"You seem in good spirits today, Marjorie," said Rachael, when they had seated themselves, "better spirits than you were last night. But you cannot deceive the eye of your friend. I know what is in your heart. I know the cause of your depression last night."

"Do you?" cried Marjorie. "How did you know? Who told you?"

"I did not need anyone to tell me," replied Rachael slowly; "I saw that you loved him."

"Yes," said Marjorie, "I really believe I do. I didn't realize it until lately, and then when he— But never mind, it's all over now. Everything is quite all right."

"No," returned Rachael, "it is not all over. I come to bring you happiness."

"Bring me happiness? What are you talking about? I am happy now," laughed Marjorie.

"It comes to tell you," Rachael went on, "that I give him up to you. You are more worthy of him than I am."

"Give him up to me?" cried Marjorie. "You can't give him up to me for he never was yours. He's mine; he told me so last night when I met him after I had left you."

Rachael felt as if she were going to faint. So John Rathbun had been in love with Marjorie all the time; had only been playing with her own affections. With an effort she pulled herself together.

"Well, John will make you a good husband," she managed to say.

"John?" cried Marjorie. "All you can think of is your John. I am talking about Robert Emberley. We had a little lovers' quarrel day before yesterday and when I saw you last night I had a fit of the blues. But we've made up again. You didn't really think I was in love with John Rathbun, did you, dear?"

"Oh, no, not at all," replied Rachael. "What do you say, Marjorie; shall we have a double wedding?"
