Betty and Her Old Barn

By BENTON JAMES
(Copyright.)

WHEN the wolf prowled near enough to the door of the old Wycliff estate to cause young Betty Wycliff serious anxiety she decided that the most sensible thing to do was to sell the old home itself and take up her abode in the stable—commonly called the barn. The new owners were quite willing that she should keep the barn since they would be putting up modern garages.

Its position was in direct line of the railway approach to the growing little suburb, which, before its tendency to sprout, was jocularly called Onthemap. But, with a generous supply of the fertilizers—builders, estate offices, butchers, etc.—the growth began and they wisely changed the name to Onthemap.

So Betty's old barn stood like a veritable lighthouse in its prominent position on High street and its three great sides gazed flatly at anyone approaching from any of three directions. The front, fortunately, held a secluded southern approach all to itself and this little right-of-way Betty had lined with tall hollyhocks and slim upright fir trees.

The prowling footpads of the wolf were too close for Betty to have done much except install a bathroom and kitchen and hardwood floors in her barn. She wanted very much to make good in the little village in which all her forefathers had been reared. An attractive sign down at the rustic gate leading to the barn informed the passerby that Miss Wycliff taught dancing and elocution.

It was between a dancing and an elocution lesson that Betty watched the approach of a young man.

Betty soon learned that he was the owner of the new department store that was even then nearing completion in the heart of Onthemap's shopping district.

"Miss Wycliff," he jumped straightway into his reason for intruding, "I will pay you $300 down and another $500 when the sign's finished if you will rent out that east wall of your barn to me for advertising purposes."

"Wait a moment," cried Betty, "until my brain regains its poise. I never see the outside of my barn—at least not on that side and—a thousand dollars a year would mean an awful lot to me. Do you think—that is—could it be done without a lot of printing?"

The young man thought most anything could be done if Betty were just to keep on looking at him with those limpid eyes.

"If I have my artist chap consult you before beginning—will that do? And if Onthemap grows as it's bound to and takes my store along with it, you shall have double that rental in another year." And seeing consent in Betty's eyes he arose, squeezed her hand until she nearly squealed and was off to arrange with his artist.

He had not been gone an hour when the owner of the new butcher shop came up the path with the self-same dreams of an advertisemept in his head and the exact same figures in the way of rental.

"But I simply couldn't stand it to have pictures of sausages and those sides of lamb and beef rioting on my barn walls," cried Betty.

"The decorative scheme shall be left entirely to you," said the young butcher, quite overjoyed at the site he had secured.

The town baker secured the third and remaining wall and Betty knew that the old prowling wolf was gone.

She retired in a somewhat wilted state to her little kitchen to brew herself a cupful of tea. Certainly having walls to one's barn was a greater asset than having a brain in one's head for the teaching of dancing and elocution.

So while Betty sipped her comforting cupful of tea the owners of the department store, the butcher shop and the baker shop were one by one dickering with the only artist that Onthemap had ever known. He was but a visitor.

His efforts to secure fame and fortune in miniature painting had so far failed, and it was with extreme joy that he welcomed the orders to take up his brushes in the interest of advertising.

"But you must consult the owner of the barn," each had warned him.

"I have a scheme that will suit her," laughed the artist. "We will simply paint crowds of well-dressed people rushing toward the open doors of the shops of you three good gentlemen."

And because Betty had a brain in her head she promptly started a tea-and-coffee room in conjunction with elocution and dancing. Young Martin Wells, swinging on his painting scaffold, thought the world a lovely place and wondered why he had ever puddled about with little dabs of paint when he could splash it in bucketfuls on the barn walls of the most lovely girl that either town or suburb had ever produced.

Betty stepped out from time to time to admire the work of the young artist and to gaze wonderingly up at anyone who could so transform the flat walls of a barn into dreams of color. She knew, too, that he would one day be a leading mural decorator and that she—but what else Betty knew was being expressed beautifully in Young Wells' eyes as he gazed hepuy down at her.
