WALLED LAKE TO HAVE NEW CATHOLIC CHURCH IN THE NEAR FUTURE

Walled Lake will some time in the near future have a Catholic church. Announcement was made this week of the donation of a lot and the building now on it for use as a church by William O'Flaherty. The lot in the O'Flaherty Lakeview subdivision is on the corner of Common and O'Flaherty street facing the park.

This is now occupied by a large barn which according to present plans will eventually be remodeled into a church building.
Starting Sunday, June 3, Rev. Joseph Schuler of Northville will hold mass every Sunday morning at 11:30 at the O'Flaherty residence at the corner of Pontiac and O'Flaherty streets. He will hold mass at Northville at 7:30 and 10:00 a. m.

This plan fits a long-cherished wish of the Catholics of Walled Lake for a place of worship and will be a great convenience to summer visitors, who have previously found it necessary to drive eight or more miles to attend church.

All the progress of men and nations is based upon sacredness of contracts—C. W. Barron.

Instead of making a fool of a man, a woman furnishes the opportunity—and lets him do the rest.

"Why, It's Just as New as the Day I Bought It"

Our drivers are accustomed to hearing this remark. For no matter how light the color, how soft the fabric, how deep the stain, we restore your summer clothes to their original freshness.

We clean sweaters, scarves, gloves, felt hats, pleated skirts, coats and sport jackets, besides clothing of every kind.

How Does a Man Propose?

By JANE OSBORN

GREGORY TEPPER possessed two complex curiously mingled—one inferiority and the other superiority. The inferiority complex, engendered when he was still in the tender years, was due to the fact that older brothers and brothers had persistently assured him that he was as homely as mud, as graceful as a cow and about as likely to be a successful ladies' man as a one-legged pirate with a hump on his back. And the superiority complex had been engendered at about the same period, by the repeated assurances on the part of the same older sisters and brothers that as a successful novelist he would probably make a fairly good blacksmith. He came out of the formative period firmly convinced that no girl would ever give him a second look and just as firmly convinced that he was going to be one of the successful writers of the age.

And so far he had done much to prove the rightness of this second conviction. His first novel—written without the shred of a love motive, and with hardly a woman in its list of characters—had made a tremendous hit. But his publishers had then assured him that the love element would have to be figured in his next story. Gregory led a wandering sort of tramp's existence when he was gathering the material for his novels. For a week or two you might have found him working with unskilled hands around some iron foundry—later you might see him passing out programs at a country circus.

But when the time came for the next writing Gregory went out to Gaston to live by himself in the rundown old farmhouse he had inherited from his grandfather.
He had progressed with gratifying results on his second novel. But when three-quarters through he was unpleasantly aware of the fact that there were still many gaps throughout the earlier chapters. Three-quarters through the book it was time for his hero to propose—but since there were gaps where there should have been preliminary love scenes and descriptions of the heroine, this proposal business offered almost unsurmountable difficulties. Besides Gregory hadn't any idea how a man proposed. Gregory believed in getting all his material at first hand. The only way then to find out how a man proposed was to propose.

Gregory pondered over the situation—and then decided to propose. Of course no woman would ever think of accepting a proposal from him, thought Gregory—but at least he could get first-hand information up to the point of the girl's response.

So Gregory decided to propose to Gladys Brooks because all along in thinking of his heroine he had had Gladys Brooks in mind. Besides he could really put his heart and soul into this business of proposing to Gladys. He could suffer with his hero in being turned down by Gladys. It would be a terrific ordeal but the kind of ordeal that Gregory felt a man ought to suffer for the sake of great achievement. Of course Gladys Brooks would despise him for imagining for a moment that she would think of marrying him. She would think him a fool. Well, perhaps a man ought to be willing to be a fool for his great work.

So Gregory walked up to the Brooks estate, where Gladys spent a month or so every summer. Gregory had met Gladys a few times in town the winter before—at dinner parties he had attended with certain chapters of his book in mind. And Gladys had asked him—perfunctorily of course, thought Gregory—to come and see her. That at least provided an excuse. And as Gregory walked up the driveway to the old mansion he willfully put himself to the mood of his hero—desperately, hopelessly in love with his heroine—Gladys Brooks. Incidentally Gregory had figured that if Gladys were home he could go through the preliminaries in half an hour, get down to the proposal and get back in time to write four or five hours more that night. Rejections didn't take long—

"I can't keep it to myself any longer," Gregory's hero began, raising through Gregory's lips. "I'm distracted about you—Gladys, Gladys, dear—Gladys, can't you see—" Only once he had come very near to saying "Philly" instead of Gladys because Philly was his heroine's name.

Gregory felt his hands go cold—felt them tremble as he took Gladys's hand in his. Then some strange power swept over him. He held Gladys close in his arms, held her close and kissed her and would not let her go. More of cruel torture than of rapture in this love business, thought Gregory. Here indeed was the supreme sacrifice to his art. He kissed her eyes—and held her still to him in one long last embrace. But Gladys did not stir.

"Gregory, Gregory," was all she said. "Gregory, why have you made me wait so long?"

Then Gregory forgot his hero and his heroine and his great work—forgot that he was an awkward fellow whom no woman could ever love, forgot too that he was a great writer.

And it was not until he had actually reached his lonely farmhouse, when the moon was high that night that he remembered the chapters he had to write.
