Is THIRTY the Love Deadline?

Charles G. Shaw was born in New York City in May, 1892, and received his early education at the Friends' Seminary, later entering the Sheffield Scientific School at Yale University, from which he graduated in 1914. The following year he spent at the School of Agriculture at Columbia and in 1917 returned to the United States. During the World War he was trained at Kelly Field, Texas, and served overseas as a pilot. He has been a member of the United States Army, Navy, and Air Force. He has composed over five hundred notes on the subject of love and written under seven different pseudonyms. Mr. Shaw lives in New York and is still a bachelor.

By CHARLES G. SHAW

According to the able and distinguished Dr. Will Durant, love is a hopeless business for him who has ultimately arrived at the great age of thirty. "To which," he says, "I make no bold as to object. I object, what is more, for the following crystallized and, I believe, pertinent reasons:

1. Love, among several hundreds of other things, is a destructive, unproductive, and unproductive. None of these qualities is in the least peculiar to youth.

2. During adolescent love, jealousy, all too frequently, plays unhappy but important roles. Neither the void involved is at all sure of the other; indeed it is rare that either is even sure of him (or her) self.

Doubt and suspicion are the double-edged issue, a destructive, unproductive and corrosive to romance. Free from these youthful misgivings, the fellow of middle-age will necessarily view matters in a more humane and tolerant light. Forgiveness is begot with years.

3. Love means appreciation. The appreciation of youth is never equal to that of middle-age.

4. To a man over thirty, love at once becomes a far more serious undertaking, and, though admittedly a condition less frequently experienced than in the case of a man under thirty, when experienced, cuts deeper into the heart. The younger fellow bair the time will exult himself that he is in love. There is no such nonsense for the other. He knows it.

5. The assumption that a man over thirty is incapable of love is the assumption that love is a mere flash in the pan, an emotional comet. But love is not a question of a few months. Nor, for that matter, of a few years. Love is the study of a lifetime.

6. Love means upon beauty. And rare is he who is able to behold in his twenties the beauties that exist for him in subsequent years.

7. The estimable Doctor Durant declares that "a man above thirty may go wild over a blond 'chick,'" and adds: "That is not love." To the latter statement I agree. As to the former, the phrase: "go wild" is for youth, not for middle-age.

8. The doctor is at the heart, too, that one should marry at the "natural" age—in other words, the "silly" age. Yet would it not seem there are already enough divorces due to "silly" age marriages?

9. Love, for a woman, includes a touch of importance in the man. Importance comes to few of us before the first thirty years.

10. For the man over thirty, love assumes a sober and more stable mien. He has tramped further along the road of experience and, hence, all other things being equal, will fall to succumb with the same degree of ease as his younger brother. Moreover, his falling in love is more exacting. His is the subtler skill also in the tendernesses of amour, which art, incidentally, must be learned as all other arts, for while one's ground-work, garnered in the flush of youth, is undoubtedly necessary, it is the technique acquired in riper years that lends the essential quality to the prime product. Behind lies that ephemeral period (Doctor Durant calls it "natural" age), when the first comely wink of a single-headed dapper caused our hero to swallow his wad of chewing-gum, clutch his coat just below the handkerchief pocket, and rush headlong to the nearest jeweler's.

11. It is a different type of love, true enough, that comes to a man after thirty. But surely it is a sadder, saner, and stancher type—a love, in fine, that makes for the possibilities of an ever-enduring devotion.

12. In conclusion, I would note the names of a few men over thirty, who it would appear, have more certainly been capable of falling in love—to wit: Robert Browning, at the age of thirty-three; Honore de Balzac, at thirty-four; Otto Eduard Leopold von Bismarck at thirty-one; Horatio Nelson, at forty; Aaron Burr, at thirty-eight; Heinrich Heine, at thirty-seven; Francois Marie Arouet de Voltaire, at thirty-nine; Johann Wolfgang von Goethe, at thirty-eight; Blaise Pascal, at thirty-one; Jean Jacques Rousseau, at thirty-three; Napoleon I, at forty-one; Goya y Lucientes, at forty-five; Julius Caesar, at fifty-two; Louis XIV, at forty-two; Wilhelm Richard Wagner, at fifty-seven; Luigi Cornaro, at seventy-nine; Thomas Parr, at eighty. . . . But why continue? History, the arts, science, government, industry—life in all its phases—is rich with such examples.
