SIXTH DISTRICT MEETING OF AMERICAN LEGION

Groves-Walker Post, No. 346 of Farmington was well represented at the Sixth District Meeting, American Legion at the Homer-Wing Post, No. 172 at Rochester last week Thursday.

James Shears of Farmington was appointed by Commander John Coldar to serve on the committee to draft resolutions to be presented to the state department at the annual convention to be held at Potosky this fall.

Following the meeting came a banquet at Odd Fellows hall at which Earl Phillips of Pontiac acted as toastmaster and made several very happy hits in the introduction of speakers, among whom were Willis Brewer, Commander of the Department of Michigan; Col. Ganzer of Bay City, principal speaker of the evening; Paul C. Eger, assistant states attorney and judge advocate, Department of Michigan.

The next meeting will be held at Potosky at the time of the convention. All Legionnaires who are planning to attend this convention are requested to make early reservations.

Henry's Business Partner

By H. LOUIS RAYBOLD

IN THE same way that visitors seeing the little Belinda busy washing or mending her dolls' clothes and marked that she'd be a great help to her mother when she grew up, so now both her friends and Henry's frequently said that she'd be a great asset in his business when she married him.

Her father and grandfather had been two of Preston's leading merchants and it seemed reasonable to suppose that some of their business ability had descended to Belinda.

She did not, however, prove the help to her mother that had been expected. When the high school curriculum offered a choice of either shorthand or domestic science, she chose the former without hesitation.

It was as typographer and typist at the MacDonald Machine shop that she met Henry Lowden, fell in love with him, and received from him an offer of marriage to be celebrated whenever his income increased sufficiently to warrant such a step.

Henry was supplementing his college training with a practical course in the shop. That is, he hoped, by being a salesman for the company, to learn the art of handling nice contracts. His uncle had bequeathed him a small legacy, and with it Henry planned ultimately to open a machine shop of his own.

"What you ought to do, Henry sweetheart," urged Belinda, "is to put out of your mind having your own business for awhile and work for promotion right here. You are now getting $30 a week. Well, if you could only land Luther Jones' job, you'd get $40. And then if you got Bill Bennett's—"

"Hold on, Belinda," said Henry hastily. "Those fellows won't die off any sooner than I shall."

"Hm?" said Belinda. "They might get fired, mightn't they?"

"Well, for that matter, so may I," declared Henry gloomily. "If my sales don't pick up this week, Merrells and Scott haven't come across with their contract yet."

Three days later Henry did not show up at the shop. Along in the middle of the morning, he telephoned Belinda that he was going out of town on business.

She opened his mail as usual, laying aside those letters which must receive his personal attention. Suddenly she paused, her eyes glued to the typewritten sheet she was holding.

"—will let our entire contract for season to your firm, if you will accept same by wire, Tuesday the sixth, before four o'clock."

The firm was that of Merrells and Scott and Tuesday, the sixth, was today. Belinda pondered with wrinkled brow. Henry needed that contract. He had said so. It seemed to her as if the opportunity had been thrust upon her to show Henry how capable of handling his affairs she was on her own responsibility.

With glowing cheeks, she decided to send the wire of acceptance. Filling out a telegraph blank, she called Jimmy, the office boy.

The rest of the afternoon, she busied herself importantly with all sorts of trifles, feeling all the time that Henry would be tickled to death at what she had done. How could he help but be?

She was on the point of locking up and going home at five o'clock, when she heard steps that were familiar hurrying along the corridor. Henry was back! Her triumphant moment had come!

"Well, old girl!" Henry's strong arms enveloped her, as his swift glance took in the fact that, as so rarely happened, they were for the moment alone. "I've certainly done one good day's work. All on my own, too."

"Yes?" said Belinda, thinking of her own day's work, but willing to anticipate a little longer the telling of it.

"Yes, sir, a good day's work. You know old Merrells and Scott?"

"Yes—yes—what about them, Henry?" Belinda felt funny for just a minute.

"They're due for bankruptcy proceedings and all contracts must be turned down. Something I read in last night's paper made me suspicious. This will certainly make me solid with the boss when he gets back. Why, Belinda!"

For Belinda had slumped weakly into his arms. "Oh, Henry," she groaned, "and I thought I was helping you. And now it won't be Luther or Bill that's fired. It will be you!"

"Me—fired?" said Henry. "I don't get you. And there's another thing. I ran across a little hardware business that's selling out. Thought maybe I'd buy it and we'd get married and—"

"Oh, Miss Bassett! Miss Bassett!" Into the office rushed Jimmy, the office boy. "I don't know whether you'll do me. I got in a fight with a newsboy downtown and the cop hauled me along a ways with him and I lost the telegram and had to go back after it and found it all mud and everything in the gutter and now I'll be fired and—oh, Miss Bassett, was it important?"

And then Henry got the surprise of his life when Belinda, with more resolution than she had ever vouchsafed him, threw her arms around the scared Jimmy's neck, and kissed him on both cheeks.

"Henry," she said solemnly, "I'll wash your dishes and keep your house, but don't ever ask me anything about the hardware business!"

WAGNER-BOSTWICK

Miss Alice Marie Wagner of Detroit and Fred Bostwick of Farmington, son of Mr. and Mrs. George Bostwick, were united in marriage by the pastor of the Methodist church at Redford, Tuesday afternoon.

The groom recently served as a member of the Coast Guards and is now connected with the Pontiac fire department. The young couple will reside for the present in Farmington.
