The Son of the Big Boss

By CLARISSA MACKIE

IT WAS young Mary Dole who carried her father's lunch down to the railroad yards every noon for years, until Mary entered high school, and her father was promoted from his outdoor job to a desk position inside the large railroad building. After that her parents forbade the girl from the yards, and Mary just went to school like dozens of other girls of her age. In the course of time she went to college and worked her own way through to a glorious graduation. She came home quite unexpectedly one day, and after greeting her mother, flew down to the office to see her father.

James Dole had now a still better job than his last one. As for pretty Mary Dole, her eyes were as blue as the sky and her hair as black as midnight. Her lovely skin grew quite pink when her big father stood up and opened his arms wide.

"It is getting toward my closing time," observed Mr. Dole after awhile, "and I have to go through the yard to see a man. You might as well go along."

So Mary trotted alongside of her father, and here and there she saw a familiar face that she smiled at and sometimes stopped and talked.

And then, all of a sudden, the most wonderful thing was happening to pretty Mary Dole. Her blue eyes had met the admiring gaze of a young man in overalls and jumper—a rather greasy young man who had a smudge of black across one tanned cheek. Just like some gay romantic mark worn by a dashing cavalier, Mary's heart jumped as he smiled and nodded up at her big father, and she noticed that of all the men she had met, he was the only one who doffed his black cap when he saw her.

"Oh, daddy, who is that young man?" whispered Mary when they were at last in the car, turned toward home.

Mr. Dole kept his eyes straight ahead on the road and answered carelessly, "Oh, that's only a young fellow who's learning the railroad business."

"Invite him out to the house, daddy, please."

"Can't be done, little girl. That's the son of the big boss."

"Not P. J. Donovan's son, father?"

"It is the same—it's young P. J. He is the same—graduated from college in June, with great laurels."

And right here he came, the day after the Fourth of July, ready for work. A fine fellow, he is!"

Mary Dole said nothing more, but she did think of young "P. J. Junior" with an odd little thrill that she had never felt before. Occasionally she met him on the street, and always his hat came off, as if he were in the presence of some great lady, but he always fixed his eyes straight ahead as if she did not know him.

"Just like a peasant lad acknowledging the presence of royalty, and never presuming to cast upon royalty's face," mused Mary Dole.

Summer passed into fall, and Mary Dole was appointed to one of the local schools. She was not disappointed when she discovered that the school was situated not far from the railroad shops, for here the children of the workers came.

Now Mary saw P. J. Jr., quite often, but they never spoke, never even smiled, unless, perhaps, a smile in the heart might count.

Young P. J. often gritted his teeth when he was alone because he often thought of lovely Mary and how she must attract other young men as well as himself. He wanted his chance to woo her. But he had promised his father not to "bother the girls" when he was learning the business.

"I will go home and tell and about it," growled young P. J. one day. So he got into his high-powered car, and tore away to another city, where he found his father.

"What's up, Patsy, that you come tearing around at this time of day?" asked the old man.

"It's a girl, father," said Patsy, blunder.

"Out with it, boy. Let me know the worst."

"She's wonderful—I've never spoken a word to her, but she is the dearest thing, and smart as they make 'em. Been through college, teaches school. Her name's Mary Dole."

"Humph. Any relation to Jim Dole, down there?"

"His daughter," said Patsy.

"Well, now, Patsy, let's go home and talk to mother about Mary Dole."

The next morning young P. J. Donovan, tore back to the railroad shops, a song in his heart. His father had promised to drop a line to Mr. Dole and tell him to invite the boy to supper!

That is how it happened that young Donovan was introduced to lovely Mary. From that time on, love was one sweet song, indeed.

It was not until after they were engaged though that Mary told Patsy that she liked him mostly because he was like his father. "You are so square—Patsy, dear, and my father always says that 'old man Donovan is the squarest, all-around man he ever met.'"
