

Police chief shows he's cable ready

MARY LINDA CALDERONE

Accolades to Farmington Hills Police Chief William Dwyer. Attaining good community relations is obviously a priority on this fine leader's list. Among the many innovative approaches he chooses to use to obtain this goal is the medium of cable television. Under the chief's direction, the Farmington Hills Police Department became the first in Michigan in 1991 to attempt to reach its citizenry via cable.

Appropriately named, Farmington Hills Police Journal allows the community an inside look into the operation of the police department, thus, educating its citizens as to the latest happenings in law enforcement.

Whether it be the program on field training of an officer, suburban gangs or discussion on semi-automatic pistols, a wealth of information is given on the subject by expert guests solicited from various law enforcement agencies on a local, state and federal level.

Did you know it takes 18 months of intensive training to be a Farmington Hills police officer? Were you aware that teenage gang activity has been documented in 25 metropolitan Detroit communities, having been reported as far north as Traverse City and as far south as Monroe County? What about the recent decision of the Farmington Hills Police Department to switch from revolvers to semi-automatic pistols because of their increased reliability and the department's desire to equip officers with a handgun that would keep pace with the increased fire power officers were confronting on the streets.

Hosting the show is Vince Wade, WJBK TV 2's reporter and longtime resident of Farmington Hills. Kim McNamara covers "Street Beat," a segment featuring new policies, procedures or happenings in the police department. Community leader and activist Betty Niculay touches on issues and problems which are of concern to residents. Officer Gary Bradley co-produces the show with Dwyer. David Tietmeyer and Michael Clayton are responsible for the fine technical quality of the program.

Don't miss May's program. Chemical sprays will be discussed. Learn how arming the officer with pepper spray leads to the reduction of injuries to suspects as well as officers. The program will also publicize the annual police open house coming up soon to 4 p.m. June 12. This is a must for all ages. Tours of the police building, a display of the Michigan State SWAT team equipment, games and prizes for children, crime technicians on hand to talk about home security, live entertainment, a magician and much more will be there.

Farmington Hills Police Journal can be seen on Channel 12 Mondays at noon and alternating Tuesdays at 7:30 p.m. You may also request the program on various law enforcement agencies on a local, state and federal level.

Tune in and take advantage of this opportunity Dwyer has so graciously bestowed on us as citizens. Keep current on police policies, practices and issues. Should you have any questions or comments concerning the program, you may write Dwyer at the Farmington Hills Police Department, 31655 11 Mile Road, Farmington Hills 48336.
