Smiling in defeat: Jennifer Levin, who finished second best in Monday's Farmington school election, has a hug for her mother, Anna Levin.

borhood precinct — No. 4 at Warner Middle School — but was outvoted in others, including absentee ballots. Levin was upset afterward in a post-election gathering at Buddy's.

"I think maybe if you campaign the hardest and go door to door ... it doesn't mean you're going to win," Levin said. "I think having people know who you are is more important. Especially in school elections because it's so quiet."

In terms of strategy, Levin concentrated on those who voted in last year's school board election.

Enberg focused on the unknown variable — OCC voters. Only 20 percent of people vote in both OCC and Farmington school elections, she said.

More than 500 people voted in the OCC question but didn't bother picking a school board candidate. There were also write-in votes.

With Levin's grass-roots campaigning, Enberg was worried.

"She (Levin) was working very hard," Enberg said. "She was walking the neighborhoods a lot. There was a lot of activity. It was a very smartly run campaign."

Nervousness in the Enberg camp could be seen in literature workers handed out at precincts. A flyer made issue of Levin's age and her one year in the community. It also noted Levin graduated from school a year ago, failing to mention it was with a juris doctor.

"I saw it (the literature)," Levin said. "We ran a clean campaign the whole time. ... Maybe she was running scared a little."

While age was an issue for Levin, a few people wondered about Enberg's close tie with the district. "The campaign's biggest misperception was she's not an independent thinker," Enberg said.

"The people who work with me know what I'm like," Enberg said. "They know I'm my own person and that I question things and make my decisions carefully."

As for what she wants to accomplish, Enberg said, "My job now is to show (voters) their trust was well founded."

Tests

Math and reading exams for fourth- and seventh graders will still be given this fall because the tests will need to be re-calibrated. State Superintendent Robert Schiller said he hopes those tests will also be moved to spring after they are adjusted.

The MEAP has been controversial in educational circles. Though it's not intended as such, the test has been used as a comparison with other districts.

Farmington students traditionally perform above the state average on the MEAP. Last year, noticeable drops occurred in reading at a few schools.

District officials continue to say standardized tests are one element in gauging student performance, along with report cards, portfolios and other assessments.

MEAP results are released in December, though that's likely to change.

"Of course, the advantage is that you have the results back that year," Mahalak said. "With this spring testing, we probably wouldn't see the results until after the school year."

"I don't know how that decision was made, but we'll work with it."
