

When it comes to obtaining breast cancer screening, women face a variety of difficulties. Transportation is no longer one of them.

The unit is available to work sites, community and senior citizens' centers and churches throughout southeast Michigan, offering screening, mammography, clinical breast examinations and breast self-examination instruction, as well as educational

The $300,000 wheelchair-accessible unit, one of only three in Michigan, can accommodate up to 20 patients per day and is accredited by the American College of Radiology.

There are more than 22 million women age 40 and older in the American workforce; 61 percent of U.S. women age 40-65 are em-

Breast cancer screening in the workplace not only promotes employee health, it also makes good business sense.

Nearly 7,000 Michigan women will be diagnosed with breast cancer in 1995; 2,000 will die of the

However, according to the Behavioral Risk Factor Surveillance System, a project of the Centers for Disease Control, only 41 percent — fewer than half — of Michigan women age 50 and over

"Early detection is the key to improving breast cancer survival, but it won't work if we don't take advantage of it," said Dr. William P. Peters, the institute's president and CEO.

Peters said he is confident the new unit will help make current diagnostic technology, treatments and information available to everyone.

The Barbara Ann Karmanos Cancer Institute is one of 25 leading, nationally recognized cancer research, treatment, education and outreach centers with some 1,600 cancer-related employees and 3,300 volunteers based at 35 offices and sites.

It is supported by several area United Ways.
