Jane Austen novel makes amazingly entertaining film

— JOHN MONAGHAN

Emma Thompson wrote the screenplay for "Sense and Sensibility" and we shouldn't be surprised. After all, who better to adapt Jane Austen than an actress who has spent most of her adult life translating literary heroines for the screen?

This amazingly entertaining movie is the second Austen film in as many months. It joins the equally fine "Persuasion" in an exclusive run at the Main Art Theatre.

It opens with the death of a family patriarch, obliged by law to leave all his money to his eldest son. Provide for the women, he whispers on his death bed, referring to the stepmother and three stepsisters who have been given a relatively scant monthly allowance.

Even before the opening credits have finished, the son and his nagging wife have justified keeping the money entirely for themselves.

The women, meanwhile, find themselves accepting the generosity of a country cousin, who offers them a cottage on his estate. Now every available man is sized up as a potential suitor for the two marrying-age daughters, Marianne (Kate Winsett) and Elinor (Thompson).

The first finds a beau in the handsome, seemingly perfect Willoughby (Greg Wise). The elder Miss Dashwood has her sights set on the unassuming Ferrars (Hugh Grant), a gentleman who wants a far simpler life than that envisioned by his demanding family.

Elinor is the first in a long line of intelligent, sensible Austen women ("Sense and Sensibility" was her first published work) who learn plenty about human nature through the course of the story. Those who appear the most noble often turn scummy while the quiet or seemingly arrogant get a chance to show their truly heroic sides.

Figuring out where it will all end up makes for one of the best experiences at the movies this year. Thank Thompson and director Ang Lee ("The Wedding Banquet"), who, without the crutch of voice-over narration, have taken Austen's interior monologues and conveyed them to the audience.

We can share the pain of the women's loyal family friend (Alan Rickman) who watches Marianne's affections shift from himself to the dashing young Willoughby. As Elinor's beloved Edward, Hugh Grant speaks volumes behind his trademark stammer and high starched collars.

For her part, Thompson concentrates on subtlety and again we learn more about Elinor from what she doesn't say than from what she does. Austen reveals in uncomfortable situations and twists of fate where Elinor is constantly reminded that the love of her life will never be hers.

With talk of the Oscars already brewing, "Sense and Sensibility" should soon leave the confines of the Royal Oak art house. Like "A Room With a View" a decade ago, it's one of those rare literary films that translates so effortlessly and intelligently to the local multiplex.
