expenses for the company. Farmington Hills will have to pay any travel expenses of potential candidates who become finalists.

All three said they would move quickly, but suggested that rushing the selection would be somewhat risky. And all three said in-house candidates would be accommodated in the search process.

While Plock has been active in Troy's selection of a new city manager and Mercer provided candidates to fill the post in Ann Arbor, four council members preferred Bennett, who they had interviewed during a favorably received management audit.

"Dick (Bennett) has the advantage, a historical background (with the city) that will save time and money," Councilwoman Nancy Bates said.

Council Members Terry Sever and Massie Kurzeja said they preferred Mercer, who impressed them that he would be the fairest.

"He (Mercer) has to start fresh, with no paradigms," Sever said.

Mayor Aldo Vagnozzi said he liked Mercer and was concerned that although the city had good experience with Bennett, his previous relationship with the city might influence the selection process.

All seven members agreed that all three were well qualified. They voted 6-1, with Kurzeja dissenting, to go with Bennett.

Bennett said applicants would enjoy a high degree of privacy as he screened them, but applicants, who were seriously interested in the post, would be interviewed by the council at public meetings.

Bennett said he will interview council members, city staff and others in the community to determine a profile of a new city manager and then begin the process of developing potential candidates. He said he would keep in touch with the council throughout the process and eventually come up with a list of eight or so candidates for the council to pare down to five finalists.

Bennett said he will look as long as it takes to find the right candidate, but said that the process should not take more than four months, from creating a profile to hiring a new city manager.
