In an ago when consumers of mass enter;
In an ago when consumers of mass enter to all the productions and state of the art technology, we may be the consumers of the consume an object lesson from which we learn, albeit vicariously, by experience. As Bruno Bettelheim writes in his 'Uses of Enchantment,' folklore and fairy tales 'convey to us the advantage of moral behavior, not through abstract ethical concepts but through that which seems tangibly right and therefore meaningful."

With hundreds of superb per-formances to her credit, 3 audio-cassette tapes that have drawn applause for style and material applause for style and material, plus numerous stories and articles in print, M. Stavish's new publication is yet another example of her creativity and professionalism. "Seeds From Ourplast," a slender 95-page book replete with charming woodcuts tool for parents and teachers. It lifts our appreciation of literature from the passive role of enjoyment to the active one of involvement.

'Balancing Act' story anthology draws on rich ethnic heritage

Balancing Act By Pearl Kastran Ahnen (Legna Press, $14.95)

This slim volume of short stories and poems is about human confrontations, small epiphanies closely observed. Ahnen is a sensitive writer who obviously cares deeply about her characters, though some stories don't ring

Ahnen sets several of her sto ries in Detroit and lets the city and its reputation stand symbol-ically – in a story about an old man's confrontation with young toughs, about a nephew who rejects his uncle's hardhearted ness at a downtown coney island, about a domestic con-frontation that leaves an abusive father dead. Some stories draw on Ahnen's Greek-American background, especially the title story which deals with a young girl's efforts to honor her parents' wishes while avoiding an overly friendly while avoiding an overly friendly uncle.

It is the small observations and insights into character that are the rewards of these stories. In the title story Ahnen lets you feel the delicate maneuvers Eleni must make to show "sevas" (respect) to someone she leathes. The story set in the concey island raises the struggle of young ideals opposed to the concerns of an older generation for money. Some stories are too blunt and the end is telegraphed too soon. Some atories also seem drawn from news accounts and popular culture rather than from the rich vein of ethnic stories that Ahnen writes so well, particularly a story set in 1921 Chicago which seemly follows a grandfather's funeral procession through the eyes of a young girl and explores slayers of family conflict. Ahen shows a rich understanding of immigrant culture and the different roads to 'becoming an American.'

The poems are like impressionist's images, quick glimpses of people and events – a memory of a dead mother mixing regret with longing; a childhood tragedy played out in a few delly sketched lines, gentle poems to children and a bittersweet farewell.

Ahnen will be signing her book
