WHEN Jean Kerr writes anything—be it a book about the frustrations of raising children or a three-act comedy about marriage and divorce you can count on a piece of well-constructed literature.

That's half the battle in community theatre productions and the grace of the play "Mary, Mary" helps to carry and adds to the enjoyment of the first production of the Farmington Players season.

The play is set in a Manhattan apartment and relies on dialogue of five characters to move the story along. The basic ingredients are: a couple one week away from having their divorce finalized, a lawyer who is an old friend, an aging Hollywood star and a wife-to-be once the divorce is finalized.

Farmington's cast has been beset by illness. Two weeks before opening the leading man was put to bed and the opening night audience saw a stand-in performance by Dick Manning. Mr. Broadhead, however, will be up on the stage next weekend.

The three supporting characters were ably played by Eileen Waldecker, Stuart Orman and Jim Haugen.

Orman has had considerable experience on the stage, while Miss Waldecker and Haugen are relative newcomers.

All in all production presents a well written comedy in a manner designed to provide the most laughs. It's a good example of community theatre.
