A ROMANCE By Louis Joseph Vance

CHAPTER IV.—(continued.)

With a twist of his eyebrows spelling doubt, Coast followed. He was not wholly satisfied hat there was any wisdom latent in this latest freak of his errant fancies. For a fortisky he had given impulse its head, and so, decile to its affects of a correct form of the content of a correct form of the co unlight.

Here, without pressage, he found his water. Was be rise to humor it? Would he find ealing in the swing of the seas, the aror of spray, the hiss of waters roken by plunging bows, the gurgle stem?

broken by plunging bows, the gurgle saturn?

Huxtable led him directly to a little was and the was and bright with new paint. "The Echo," he introduced here." "the year old, weather wise, sound at sweet, fast, and able. Owner left her with me for able. Seven hundred and a bargain."

Coast strolled round the boat with ne ore critical of her lines, then clambered up the skeleton the of the cradies and applying in her celapit, verifying Huxtable's catalogue of altractions. Presently he climbed down again, impressed that the boat would probably justify its recommendation to the letter.

"When can you put her in the water."

"In fifteen minutes."

"In fifteen minutes,"
"Do so, then, please, and have the gasoline tanks filled sind the batteries garded up. "Il want these besides." He tound a peticl and scrap of paper and kertbibled a list of supplies, "You're a spare moorting off here!" he thquired, and rejected an affirmative, "Then put ber off, i'll sleep aboard her tonight. Now 'Ill take a turn ip town and buy provisions and things."
He fitted out without thought of economy: in the list of his acquisitions he could find no hack; by nightfain he below as furnished with everything that Coast could think of as easential or desirable for constructed.

Warmth came of exertion; refreshed, intigorated, he swam with swiftness and strongth, concerned only to reach his goal before the man could sluk finally. At length winning to "With all the pleasure in life."

"It's Thece Infernal Clothes."

Coast took him down into the cabin, for a chance to close in and at the same time escape the clutch of those "It must you"ll be comfortable," he or valiantly thrashing arms.

"Now, now!" he cried, as one might strive to socihe a resitive horse. "Eary, there! You're only tiring yourself out."

The splashing ceased in some measure, the man wigsling awkwardly round to bring the source of that voice within his range of understanding.
"Lord!" he said, breathless. "You're who strolls stark-naked... aboard within bits range of understanding.
Encouraged by this note of sanity, Cosst swam nearer. "Need any heip!"
