lounge. "Here, I can give him a true flavor of the day."

That flavor included making announcements over the public announcement system and visiting a variety of classrooms, from kindergarten through fifth grade. It also included a mandated discussion about leadership.

"We will need so many principals and elementary school teachers in the next years, with so many educators retiring," Smith said. "If we don't have good leadership in public education, we're in for hard times."

"I want to give Jenkins a good, hard look at what we do. I want to encourage him to hold onto that dream."

college choice, though he's narrowed it down to Central Michigan University, Ferris State University or Michigan State University.

Eduware said he's prepared to handle the emerging challenges facing teachers. In light of all the school violence in recent years, Eduware would like to be a beacon of stability in a sometimes unpredictable environment.

and understanding of each student's feelings," Eduware said. "Sometimes there are things going on at home that you don't know about."

"That is one of the most mature observations I've ever heard a student say," Smith told him.

Eduware smiled. With Eduware watching a fourth-grade classroom interact, Smith stepped aside to offer some observations of the 17-year-old future educator.

"He's just another great example of the excellent job the high schools are doing in developing leadership," Smith said.

After about three hours of quasi on-the-job training, Eduware and Smith headed to the Farmington Training Center to join students and their accompanying shadowed school employees. Many students shared their definition of leadership.

"A leader is somebody who's not afraid to make a decision," said John Sloan of Farmington High School. "An administrator is somebody who respects people and thusly receives a lot of respect." A true leader leads by example.

Chatting in the back of the room were Beechview Elementary School principal Norma Jenn Sasa and her shadow, Harrison High School senior Amy Prater-Manor, who was clearly impressed with Sasa.

"It's amazing how the principal influences a class," Prater-Manor said. "When she walks into a classroom, it's like - I don't want to say it's like she's a god - but there was definitely an aura around her."

While Prater-Manor learned what it's like to be a principal, Sasa got to see her school through new eyes.

"It's uplifting to have someone else come in," Sasa said. "It was nice to show her off because she's a product of Farmington schools."

After calling for a brief sidebar discussion, Tyrner set the date for April 14. Snell said in addition to tapes, photographs and other evidence, police confiscated 13 hand-held computers. While he might have been disappointed by the April date, Snell said simply, "I'll just work faster."

Thompson stood mute at his arraignment Friday, and a "not guilty" plea to a count of criminal sexual conduct in the fourth degree and a count of criminal sexual conduct in the second degree was entered for him.

At the preliminary hearing, he will either plead guilty to the charges, or a trial date will be set, Snell said.
