Detroit's jazz heritage sets stage for new Burns' series

With the epic story of jazz coming up on Detroit's Public Television this month, filmmaker Ken Burns takes viewers on an astonishing musical journey that began in the dance halls, saloons, and street parades of New Orleans in the early 20th century.
Public television is devoting 19 hours of airtime to the Ken Burns film in celebration of the music genre's centennial.
At 7:30 p.m. Jan. 7, the eve of the jazz series premiere, Detroit Public TV's Backstage Pass takes its spotlight on Detroit's jazz heritage. The recollections of some of the area's venerable artists, such as Harold McKinney, Donald Walden and Marcus Belgrave, will help to recreate the sounds and environment of two distinct eras in Detroit's enduring jazz scene.

The first wave occurred in the 1940s and 1950s, and Backstage Pass music producer Ron Pangborn taps into the memories and music of legendary pianist McKinney.
"The seminal Detroit jazz sound emerged during the bebop period. It was rhythm-heavy and had a name all its own. They called it hard-bop, and its industrial quality has been recognized in a large percentage of the music coming out of the city ever since," says Pangborn.
The second heyday of Detroit jazz took place during the 1960s, as the city became a home for artists who were pushing the beat during the counter-culture movement of that decade. It was a place that Miles Davis and many other artists honed their skills and developed their unique styles, which Belgrave and other legends began an enduring reign as architects and practitioners of the distinctive sound of Detroit jazz.
Best of all, the next generation of Detroit jazz artists has arrived, as evidenced by the internationally acclaimed saxophonist James Carter. It's inspiring to watch the torch being passed by those who have contributed so much to our area's musical heritage. On the Jan. 7 Backstage Pass, McKinney shares the spotlight with one of his students - a young pianist named Roland Hamilton.

Another segment features Rayce Biggs, an emerging trumpet player who is a Belgrave protégé.
"Biggs' strengths are his tremendous talent as an artist and his understanding of the realities of the business. His background and training is rich with New Orleans jazz, but he combines this traditional style with the practical benefits of having his own studio to develop his sound and pay the bills," says Todd Hastings, who produces the segment.
What is clear in Burns' film and the new crop of Detroit area musicians is the history of jazz is still unfolding. Have yourself a jazzy little January.
