'Jurassic Park III' keeps the dinosaurs coming

By Jay M. Grossman

Run Barney. Those snarling Velociraptors, swooping Pteranodons, and some giant nasty fella called a Spinosaurus are back in Steven Spielberg's Jurassic Park III.

Sam Neill returns as dinosaur expert Dr. Alan Grant, the only man on the planet who can glance at a pile of dino poop and tell you it came from a Brontosaurus — not a Stegosaurus. Eight years after the first Jurassic Park movie stomped out of the jungle, Grant returns to the forbidden Isla Sorna after a 14-year-old boy disappears while vacationing off the coast of Costa Director Joe Johnston does a great job with the dinosaurs. The Pteranodons are especially menacing with their missile beaks and massive wingspans.

Rica.

William H. Macy (Fargo) and Amanda Kirby (The Family Man) are desperate parents who hoodwink the doctor into joining their rescue mission by posing as wealthy entrepreneurs planning an aerial tour of T-rex island for their wedding anniversary.

Badly in need of cash to keep his fossil research alive, Grant cautiously agrees to go along as a guide. By the time he realizes the plane is landing, it's too late. How that thumping? Yep, a dinosaur is coming.

Director Joe Johnston does a great job with the dinosaurs. The Pteranodons are especially menacing with their missile beaks and massive wingspans. I liked them the best, almost as much as those evil flying monkeys in The Wizard of Oz. And there's a couple of fun scenes involving a cellular telephone.

But overall, only a few of the scenes in Jurassic Park III — not to mention the 1997 sequel — match any of the suspense captured in the original film. Missing are those truly scary moments, such as when the car stalled in front of the T-rex exhibit and a cup of water began to vibrate ominously. Or when the caged Velociraptors grabbed something extra for dessert after eating a live cow during their feeding.

Maybe there's only so much you can do with genetically engineered dinosaurs stuck on a tiny island. As one audience member said while walking out: "Pretty good . . . I just hope they're not planning a fourth."

Good advice. I give it three out of four raptor eggs.

Dino-tastic: Jurassic Park III still screaming in theaters.
