husband when they lived in the same apartment complex. She knew he was the man she'd marry, but — as she says — it took her a few years to convince him. They've survived a raft of tough times by riding out the storms together.

Another couple I know started dating in high school. They married young, and at one point, almost separated. But with counseling, faith and a shared determination to make their relationship work, they survived and love each other more for having done it.

You don't find that kind of love in seven minutes or less. Heck, seven minutes is barely long enough to determine whether someone can speak in complete sentences.

The organizers of these events will tell you it is not their intent to introduce you instantly to your life partner. But people will come into this believing that all the same, because so many of us will do almost anything to avoid living alone. We forget the important stuff, like relationships sometimes take hard work, perseverance, forgiveness, compassion, the sacrifice of pride and a tenacity of spirit. And most of all, they take what we have so little of these days — time. Time to get to know someone, time to see whether the spark of recognition means something more than a conflagration of pheromones.

I read somewhere that men and women are in the middle of a gender war these days, that lasting relationships are difficult if not impossible to maintain because of our changing roles. We don't need each other any more to survive. Marriage, once considered an indispensable social expectation, is now optional.

Divorce has created a group of second-wave singles who have had their children and now must search again for True Love in the middle of their lives. Let's face it: We want to believe it's out there, that there's one person who will be our perfect match. So we keep looking, keep believing it can happen in seven minutes or seven hours or seven days. If it doesn't, we walk away, never knowing whether we've left behind what we were looking for all along.

True Love doesn't happen in an instant. It's where we find ourselves after we have learned how to be someone's friend even on days when we aren't feeling particularly friendly. It comes to us after we have learned to be kind in the face of unkindness. It is our reward for loyalty and patience, respect and understanding.

Most importantly, True Love is not what we find in the beginning, but what we discover in the end.

Is it possible to find a life partner in a first glance or a first kiss, on a speed date? Of course it is.

Finding out whether that love is true takes time. How long, I don't know.

But I'm guessing a lot longer than seven minutes.
