North students attend journalism camp

A group of North Farmington High students who attended a journalism boot camp' held recently in Troy came away with a little Information and a greater appreciation for their journalism teacher.
Juniors Samantha Lehto and Al Kawashima and sophomore Katle Rivard attended the 'Write On 'Time!' boot camp with teacher Lisa Anastasio.
Organized by Troy native
Angela King, the conference was held March 20-22 at the Troy Marriott Hotel.
Anastasio used part of her classroom budget to pay the $1500 per person registration fee for her students and herself. The entire conference cost $350 per person, not including hotel meals, abe said, adding she found it cussier to stay in Troy rather than driving the students back and furth each day.
King, a former Detroit journalist, now works as a part-time reporter for the Montchair Times in New Jersey, She's studying filmmaking at Montchair State University and says she has a passion for the written word."

King spent the first evening with the kids primarily discussing the news business, from how it began in the U.S. to what it is today. On Friday, she concentrated on news gathering and writing. The day's highlight was a press conference, featuring Nolan Finley, editorial page editor for The Detroit News, Susan Haddad, president of editor for The Detroit News, Susan Haddad, president of SBH Communications, a public relations firm, and Cindy Goodaker, executive editor of Crain's Detroit

Business.
After peppering panellsts with questions, students were on deadline until 1 p.m.
Saurday writing news articles or columns they generated from attending the "Write On Time!" boot camp.
Area journalists, including Farmington Observer Editor Jon! Hubred, judged the best five articles or columns submitted.
The conference drew fewer

The conference drew fewer than 20 participants, includ-ing one who was college-age. It had been postponed from the fall.

Annstasio, who said she was the only teacher there, saw room for improvement in light of current world events. The students who are events. The students who are accustomed to Anastasio's lectures hoped for more cur-rent events tie-ins like dis-cussion of the war as well. "There's a war going on and we were talking about journalism to 1643," Lehto said.

"I would have moved the TV into the room," Anastasio added.

the students came away

The students came away feeling good about the journalism education they're getting from Anastasio and felt he deadlines times were longer than what they needed to write their stories.

"They gave us 10 hours to write...500 words," said Lehto, whose mother, Penelope, once worked for the Australian Brondeasting Commission and as a free-lancer in New York.

However, students liked the advice panelists gave about where to attend college.

lege. "I'm not sorry we went."
Anastasio said. "When you take students out of the classroom, it's a different environment, a different relationship."

Power Problem Solvers among best in state

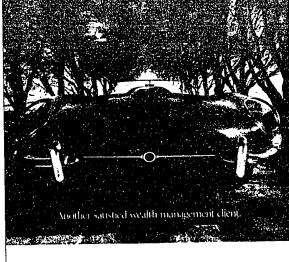

The Future Problem Solving cam from Power Middle team from Power Middle School recently participated in the Future Problem Solving State Bowl at Eastern Michigan University.
The team qualified as one of the top 120 teams from schools all over the state.
Future Problem Solving is a reserve operarm. Teams are presented with a societal or technological problem project-ed to some time in the future. Students must research infor-mation about the problem, develop a proposal for a solu-tion, and develop a persuasive way to present their solution to judges. The process simulates the problem solving strategies used in business and industry, and gives students an opportu-nity to do deep research and critical analysis of complex sit-nations.

The students on this year's qualifying team were XiXi Guo, Samantha Dramer, Kelsi Lindhlad and Allison Vial. They were coached by eighth grade teacher, Lorna Bussa.
