OAKLAND-ADDS MODEL SHOP FOR ITS DEALERS

Purchasing a car in the early days of the automobile industry entailed no obligation on the part of the manufacturer to the buyer beyond delivering it in satisfactory running condition and keeping it so for a reasonable length of time. The purchaser gave little thought to the car's probable trade-in value, or to the quality and accessibility of service facilities for keeping it in good running condition.

But this picture, like many another connected with the industry, has come a complete about-face in recent years. Today's buyer is concerned not only with the style and performance promised by the new model, but he also wants to assure himself of the soundness of his investment from a re-sale standpoint and of the completeness of the service organization which will keep his car tuned up.

Service, instead of a side issue of the dealer's business, has become a major factor in swaying the sale of a new car, according to R. A. Armstrong, service manager of the Oakland Motor Car Company. It is more important than color or quick pickup in the permanent satisfaction the car will bring the owner.

"Years ago owners cared little about service because they seldom ventured beyond the territory served by their home dealer," Mr. Armstrong said. "But today the motorist, whether touring New England or the National Parks of the West, wants to feel that should his car require attention, he is within easy calling distance of a service station where he may get genuine factory parts and factory-trained men to work on his car. He wants to know that service facilities are uniform and good wherever he may be."

"In anticipation of this need the progressive manufacturer is aiding his dealers in many ways to place and maintain service facilities on the highest plane possible. Service supervisors stationed in all quarters of the country keep constant watch over the dealer's shops in the territory; service instructors drill their men in proper repair methods, and mechanics maintained at the factory put the mechanics through intensive courses in car repair work."

"As a further step in this direction we maintain at the plant at Pontiac, Michigan, what we call a 'Model Service Station.' This is laid out to serve as a pattern for the dealer in planning his own shop and work shop and tools. We also use it to demonstrate correct repair methods to the men in the field who maintain the factory. By doing this work in the model shop the dealer's shop men get the 'feel' of the shop and go home with definite ideas of how to improve their own local service stations."
