A Block of Sorrow

DOWN in "Little Old New York" there are many triangular-shaped blocks of varying sizes. Most of them never amounted to very much. That is to say, history-making episodes usually occurred elsewhere. A few, however, have felt the gesture of the magic wand of Fate and played prominent if peculiar roles in the drama of time.

Among the latter is that small, three-cornered block bounded by Sixth Avenue, Tenth street and Greenwich street. Its roll has been to act as home base for the Jefferson Market police court and the Jefferson Market Jail—the "Twin Houses of Sorrow," for the past six decades.

Here it was, in 1905, that the first night court in America convened to act on a docket covering nothing but vile acts of human beings. Here it was too that the highest and lowest in the land came to deal exclusively with infractions of law committed by women.

These innovations in court practice attracted world-wide attention. Students of crime and reform, editors and others flocked in from every point of the compass to observe the proceedings and study the results. Many notable criminals have heard their sentences pronounced here. As many as five hundred "rough customers" are said to have been arraigned on a single night.

Thus it came to pass that this insignificant little block has been privileged to be the scene of that which in its day has the reputation of being the most colorful court in the world.
