Pipe Lines

BACK in 1865, in Pennsylvania, an underground transportation system was born. Strange as it may seem, it has continued to grow until today it has about 90,000 miles of line, mainly between the Rocky mountains and the Atlantic ocean, does an unbelievably large and slippery business, operates almost automatically and continuously and yet so quietly that relatively few persons know much about it.

Curiously enough, the petroleum pipe-line system of America, like a railroad, has its main and branch lines, terminals, storage yards, stations, dispatchers, telephone and telegraph systems. Generally speaking, its transporting pipes vary in size from four to twelve inches and mainly are laid underground at varying depths or on river beds. Sometimes they follow their own routes. Their capacity varies according to working conditions. Ordinarily a four-inch line can be counted on to handle about 3,800 and an eight-inch line about 21,000 barrels per day.

Pumping stations, two to ninety miles apart, depending upon local conditions, but generally about forty miles apart, to keep the oil on the move from well to tank, to storage yard, to refinery, to market, as needed. Day and night, week days and Sundays, this gooey fluid that lubricates the nation's machinery moves, incessantly yet silently, on its way. Gauges keep the operating officials advised when leaks or stoppages occur and communicating systems bring the repair gangs who see to it that the service is quickly re-established.

In addition to being a greasy business, pipe-line traffic is chiefly a one-way business—east. Very little of it moves in the reverse direction.
