They Both Loved
Music

By LEETE STONE

(Copyright.)

THE tenth year after the war found J. Rudolf Straum much like scores of other young men in Wall street, except for four deep scars on his forehead just under his shining blond hair. People were seeing again the stamp "Made in Germany" on chinaware and toys without reason. "Racism" or "chastra directors and slingers were touring the States without being mobbed. America was peace-minded.

Rudolf had always been peace-minded. To this day he had but a vague idea what the war was all about. The master key of Rudolf's life was music.

All day he hummed fragments from the great composers, while copying foreign values in his Wall street cage.

One evening he was eating his supper in his tiny kitchenette domain when the notes of a Chopin nocturne suddenly arrested his ears in the act of crunching a lettuce leaf. He remained still, trying to locate the music coming from the adjoining apartment surely. Rudolf never moved until the pianist's hands came to rest. Then he saluted eating his salad, coffee and bite of cheese.

Presently—erecting, thunderous concerto of Grieg. Rudolf relaxed, smiling, satisfied. What a touch! What feeling! What emotion yearningly expressed! A master pianist—a professor of music, no doubt.

The music ended with a chord that brought happy goosebumps to Rudolf's frame. Slowly he rose, impelled to answer in terms of his own. Soon a plant tenor floated forth—in an aria from Pagliacci, bird-clear, swelling in volume as it struggled to escape the encroachment of the fat.

Had Rudolf been mindful of aught save his melody, he might have heard the creak of boards outside his door as a slim girl crept close, laying her ear to the crack that she might catch every overtone and nuance, her blue eyes closed in joy.

This interchange of rhapsody continued evening after evening. Rudolf's silver-platined notes were answered by nocturne, scherzo, polonaise and fugue. Arriving one evening from the street, weary with his struggle over dollars, marks, guilders and pounds sterling, Rudolf was thrilled by a vision in his vestibule—a small, blue-eyed creature saying "Dara!" as she, tried jauntily with nail file and door key to spear an envelope from her letter box.

She colored as Rudolf came upon her, but his disarming smile and friendly eyes assured her he liked the "dara" and could offer equivalents in a richer language if the vision needed any more. Her vision fading from her face, she said:

"It's impossible to dig anything out of these old-fashioned mail boxes."

"But it is old-fashioned houses that most I like."

Rudolf was too overjoyed to care about his English, for he saw that the vision's mail box belonged to the apartment whence issued the marvelous music. His adoration shone in his wide Saxon eyes.

Rudolf's dreams were now adorned with hazy pictures of operatic heroines that were wont to merge into the trim figure he had seen in the vestibule. Her playing spoke to his soul as her eyes had spoken that evening. He did not know it; but often those eyes were just behind his door as she listened in ecstasy to his songs.

Opening this door suddenly one evening, Rudolf nearly precipitated her into his arms. It was hard to say which, Ann Farris or Rudolf Straum, was more astounded.

"Blimey!" cried Rudolf, "pardoe, Farris—I forgot—I am—yes—my bell ring and I rush—"

"Heavens, I've been leaning against the bell! Please forgive me—it's your glorious music—I crept out here to listen—"

Ann broke off, staring. The velvet tones continued. She expressed her wonder.

"You see, I love music so. And your voice is—was—so perfect—that is, who is singing in your apartment?"

Rudolf would have shed his blood to claim the voice as his own.

"Fruelich, Fruelich, it is Caruso. That is the end. I turn him off now."

Rudolf returned to find Ann choking with laughter.

"It is a joke, yes—to one who plays like you, Farris—"

"I'm Ann Farris."

"Miss Farris, forgive; do not laugh but, Ach, you are a musician—it is natural you laugh at my phagograph music. I live on music, Miss Farris. I listen to you always to Rudolf glanced reverently at Ann's hands.

ARTHUR W. SPENCER

Formal announcement by Arthur W. Spencer, county drain commissioner, that he will be a candidate for re-election this fall was made by Mr. Spencer this week.

The county drain commissioner is a resident of Rochester and has made his home in Oakland County practically all of his life. Under his supervision during the past six years more than 55 miles of drains have been built in the State.

During the past year Mr. Spencer has been president of the State Association of County Drain Commissioners and as head of the Association Legislative Committee practically wrote the revised drain laws as adopted by the Legislature in 1929.

In announcing his candidacy for re-election Mr. Spencer points to his record in office and maintains that a policy of economy has been followed in all drain work. During the past year, and even before the period of industrial depression, the drain commission office had adopted a policy of constructing only drains that were immediately essential. Upon his recommendation the State Association has followed a similar policy and deferred construction of drains which can wait until property owners are better able to pay for them.
