Hay Supply Lowered By Abnormal Demand

On result of the continued drought this year, which may prove expensive for Michigan farmers, has been the great demand for hay and straw for use in Ohio and Indiana, and the sale of roughages from Michigan may have reduced the supply for home use below the amount needed, according to G. A. Brown, head of the animal husbandry division of Michigan

State College.
Bids for alfalfa hay which is to be shipped or trucked into other states have been as high as $30 a ton for second cutting, and many farmers who have had any surplus have already sold it. Professor Brown believes that most of this hay would find ready sale in Michigan before it will be possible to turn stock on pastures next spring.
If Michigan feeders have to purchase roughages this year, it may be necessary to go into distant markets, and the cost of shipping the hay will be added to the purchase price. In addition to the extra expense, there is always danger of importing undesirable weeds in shipments of hay from a distance.
Farmers who have hay for sale will undoubtedly take advantage of the abnormal demand and will continue to sell for shipment outside the state, and farmers who will have to buy hay are advised by Professor Brown to check up on the supply of surplus hay in their community before it is too late to make local purchases.
The young men are urged to train themselves for leadership, and anyway many of them have been leading the girls up to the soda fountains the past summer.
People who favor trial marriages, should explain what shall be done with the trial children.
