Joan Finally Changed Her Mind

By RUBY GRUBER

(By Staff Member of the Farmington Enterprise)

JOAN slid her high geared sports roadster into motion, and swiveling out into the fast moving traffic on Michigan boulevard, gave vent to her enraged feelings by passing car after car.

"The beauty of Lake Michigan so lazily tapping the shore, the bright bathing suits dotting the beach, passed unseen by Joan. A secluded driveway further up the lake brought only painful memories. She turned her pretty head as she neared the shady lane, her calm set in a determination not to give way to tears. He had parked there one afternoon, told her of his ambitions, and he also told her she was the most beautiful girl he had ever met.

Jack Brandon had seemed so nice. It was true she had only known him a week, but Joan was beginning to think about the tall good-looking fellow more than she had ever thought about any one else. He worked in the law office of the district attorney, and was rich in his own right. Not that it made any difference to Joan. He had seemed so eager, so refreshing, and so real compared with the shallow social men to her own crowd. He had "rushed" her at breath-taking speed, with "phone calls" from a show and dinner. Then, the luncheon for today was his suggestion, as they sat in the soft moonlight of the Country club last night. Joan had arrived on the exact minute, happily anxious to see this man who had crept into her heart.

But Jack did not come. . . . Joan waited fully thirty minutes, seated at the little table cozily hidden away from the world by two huge palms. They had dined there once before—it seemed ages ago, but in reality it was only last Monday. He had held her hand and gazed into her eyes, then shyly raised her white palm to his lips and kissed it almost reverently. Today . . . he had not even come to meet her!

Joan's eyes filled with tears, as she allowed her troubled thoughts to vision again the picture she saw as she came out of the tearoom. Jack was getting into a yellow cab with a girl!

Almost numbed with surprise, Joan got into her car. As she now swung the car into the driveway of her home, she hoped that her mother's bridge party had not yet begun. Joan felt very much like crying and wanted to get to her own room. But luck was against her, the bridge party was beginning.

She stood in the hall. The wide archway to her right showed the bridge tables surrounded by well-groomed, well-fed, happy matrons. Her tall, stately mother moved gracefully from one table to another.

"Perkins," Joan called softly to the butler.

"Yes, Miss," the submissive Perkins answered.

"Any phone calls for me?" she asked anxiously.

"Not any, Miss," Perkins answered. "Thanks," she started up the stairs. Her one hope had been that Jack might have phoned at the last moment. The young girl might have been his sister, or some relative.

She would call his office. Softly she tiptoed down the stairs to the telephone, and gave the operator the number.

"Will you connect me with Mr. Brandon's office, please," she asked the girl who answered.

"Mr. Brandon is out for the afternoon. Do you wish to leave a message?"

"No, thanks, no message," Joan hung up the receiver.

Now, to get to her room! She could not bear the thought of going in among all those chattering women. As she gained the foot of the stairs, her mother came through the doorway.

"Joan, I am so glad you came! Mrs. Crawford telephoned at the last minute. The baby is feverish, and she hated to leave him alone with the nurse. You must fill in."

"Yes, mother," Joan answered. After all, what did it matter what she did? Playing bridge would keep her occupied, and she could have that cry later.

The afternoon passed slowly to the girl. But, as all things will do, the bridge party finally ended.

After the last of the guests were gone, Joan went to her room.

"Marie—I will not be at home o'clock. Mr. Jack Brandon at any time," Joan spoke to the maid. "You will please tell Perkins."

"Yes, Miss Joan," the maid answered dutifully.

Never Burned Witches
Although Salem was the center of the witch craze, none were ever burned there, in spite of a common belief to the contrary. Many were hanged and one man was pressed to death between heavy stones. The Massachusetts tercentenary brought out many curious facts, and Nathaniel Hawthorne's granddaughter, Editha Hawthorne, gave some little known sidelights on her ancestral town, Salem, in a special article for St. Nicholas magazine. Samuel McIntire, the first American architect, and originator of the New England colonial style of wooden houses, was born in Salem in 1737 and most of its fine old houses were built by him.

What Does "Savvy" Mean?

"Savvy" or "saavey" is an American corruption of Spanish "sabe," a form of the verb "saber," meaning to know. "Do you savvy?" is equivalent to Spanish "¿sabes usted?" Both mean, "Do you know?" "Savvy" was originally acquired from the Mexicans by early ranchers in the Southwest who spelled and pronounced the Spanish word "savvy" rather than "sabe" because in Spanish "b" and "v" are pronounced almost alike and in many words these letters are used interchangeably. When employed as a noun "savvy" means understanding, mental grasp or knowledge of affairs. Of course, it is slang in both senses.—Pathfinder Magazine.

Hunting for Pest Eradicators

In 85 years the Smithsonian Institution has built up the largest natural history collection of North America in existence. Among the many objects of study that have a direct bearing on industry and commerce are the bean beetle, the boll weevil and the Japanese beetle. In the laboratories of the Smithsonian Institution work is carried on to ascertain the natural enemies of these pests, their origin and means of immigration. In order to learn these things it is necessary to maintain a complete collection of all forms of the species.

The news about the spring styles fails to mention the jail uniforms that many sporty gents should be wearing.
