Two Former Commerce Residents Pass Away

Two former residents of Commerce were taken by death this week, both burials being in Commerce cemetery.

Mrs. Francis B. Eby, who was known by some of the older residents of Commerce, died Friday afternoon at the Hermitage Hotel in Grand Rapids, where she had made her home for many years. She was 92 years old. When she was a girl her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Andrew Borden, lived on the farm now occupied by Joseph A. Long. She was buried Monday.

Mrs. Emma McCoy, who formerly lived here, and who recently lived in Detroit, died Sunday at the home of her son, Russell at Sears Lake. She was buried Wednesday in Commerce cemetery.

Most Artistic Job He Ever Had

By CHARLES 'LOAN REID
(A 1931 McClure Newspaper Syndicate)

ELLERY MARTIN pattered about the little smitly, salvaging bolts, scraps of iron plat and other odds and ends from the leavings of many jobs done for the farmers and villagers of the community in which he lived. Occasionally he glanced from the doorway, looking both ways along the village street. Not a patron was in sight. After an hour of work he paused and picked up his ears. He hurried to the door again. A man reined in a weather-beaten sorrel mare which was hitched to a little buggy that had seen long service.

"Want 'er shoe, 'er shankins?" asked Ellery in a hopeful tone. "Reckon not, Ellery," said Jenkins. "Jest stopped to see ef yuh knowed of anybody as wanted a boss? Got to sell mule. Got to buy a automobile. I reckon to loco some in the family."

"I reckon, Jenkins—I reckon. It 'pears as bosses is goin' out." Martin's hands fell limply to his sides, and he shook his head mournfully. "Been shoelin' horses for eight year, Jenkins; an' I reckon as how yuh'd say I was the best shoer in the country?" "No mistake about that, Ellery."

"They ain't no more bosses comes now. Of a few pnows to sharpen—their's about all."

"Well, ef yuh see anybody wantin' a boss, wished yuh'd send 'em to me." "Yeah; all right, Jenkins—I'll do it." Jenkins drove away. Ellery waited half an hour for another patron, but none came. Behind the shop was a little trail that led to a small cottage in the rear where Ellery and his wife made their home. Martin slowly walked down the trail, paused in front of the cottage, with his head bowed. Absent-mindedly his hand crept to the doorknob and closed upon it.

"Aethy," he said, when finally he stood in the open doorway, "whatever air we agoin' to do?"

"Ain't had no jobs this mornin', Ellery?" "Narry, nor none yesterday, 'cept sharpenin' three pnows. Then tractors they go to 'sist' 'em run out the mules; an' the automobiles has run out the bosses. Ell's a bad case, Aethy."

"I grant hit is, Ellery. Lord, I reckon we've lived too long."

There was silence for some moments. Presently the stillness was interrupted by a sharp call from the shop.

"Hello, Blacksmith!" came the call. At the front door stood a man in knickerbockers and riding boots. Beyond him to the street was a shiny little road cart. Harnessed to the cart in bright tan-leather trappings stood the most beautiful mare that Ellery Martin ever had seen. The man's face traveled quickly to the animal's shapely hoofs. Instantly he discovered a bare hoof, and his blood coursed quickly through his veins in anticipation not only of a job, but of such a job, shoeing such a mare.

"I was told," began the visitor, "that I would find a horse-shoer here."

"They ain't no better horse-shoer than what I be, stranger," declared Ellery with emphasis. "All right, friend; let me see what you can do for my mare. Pull the other shoes, and give me a four-hall job. I am going down the street a little way. Be back, time you get the mare shod."

Ellery Martin rubbed his hands together gleefully, as he turned about for his kit. Forty minutes later the owner of the mare returned, to find the animal ready for the road. Walking around her, one after the other he pulled up each hoof, inspecting the job critically, while Ellery stood by watching his movements. Presently the stranger turned to Martin, with a smile.

"The most artistic job I ever have had, friend!" exclaimed the man with enthusiasm. "How much do I owe you?"

"Dollar and a half," said Martin prospectively.

"Dollar-fifty?" There was a slight infection in the man's voice.

"Maybe hit sounds a little high—" Ellery began to stammer.

"High? Man, that job is worth five dollars to me—and here is your money."

Ellery Martin looked at the bill in amazement.

"And by the way, Horse-shoer, do you get much work here?"

"No. What 'il the automobiles an' the tractors, I'm jest about done for."

"Good! Then I'll tell you what I'll do; I'll give you fifty dollars a month, with house rent and water and lights free, to move to my stables and shoe horses for me—no mules—no rips—just thoroughbred horses!"

Ellery Martin stared at the man a moment, and tears came into his eyes. "I ain't dreamin', I don't reckon, Mister?" he asked.

The man laughed. "No, old man—the bargain will be mine."

"Lord, I got to run," told Aethy. "Excitedly he burst in upon his wife at the cottage. 'Aethy, oh 'Aethy—' The old man choked and pointed toward the stranger standing in the rear doorway of the shop, he managed to stammer:

"Ask him, Honey—ask him!"
