Lone Watcher in the Shadow

By A. W. PEACH

(As by McClure Newspaper Syndicate.)

(WNU Service)

BEFORE him stood the House of Mystery. It had been a long walk from the village, but Morgan, after listening to the story of the place as told by a wide-eyed native, had made up his mind to visit it. And here it was.

Morgan went on, taking no stock in the superstition that kept the mountain villagers away from the place. The view down the valley was superb; but he thought of the things told him by his informant. Here the strangers had come, asking questions of no one, but building the pleasant house which now stared like a dead thing down the valley. The man, so Morgan was told, was named Albrecht; his wife, young and handsome with a grave, dark beauty, was known as Erna. They gave out the brief information that they had come there because of Mr. Albrecht's health. They had lived in peace, coming to the village for a brief visit and returning to the distant house, until the fatal night. Morgan shook himself from his reverie and turned to the house. The door yielded to his touch, and looking in he remembered something else. The house and every thing in it had been left as it was that night.

No one knew what had taken place. When the constable from the village came, he found the wife there, in a stained nightgown, and in the room beyond Albrecht, a raving maniac, with blood upon his hands, and near him a knife of foreign make.

It had been easy to charge him with the murder; and so the case had been settled.

Morgan turned into the room. Most of the furniture was still there, dusty sagging. He went on into the living room and found him facing a plug organ, built into the wall.

Morgan left the room and started to go upstairs, but the dark, forbidding landing above, the musty odor from the cellar, these, with the thoughts the place had aroused, drove him out to the fresh air.

"Enough for me!" was his conclusion, and he worked his way through the weeds to what had evidently been a summer house, thinking to rest there before his tramp back to the village.

As he stepped into the summer house, his eye caught between the floor boards unheeded by the frost and change of years, a glint of paper. Bending over he pulled out a folded note, stained and faded. He opened it.

"Somebody was reading that here and shored it down between the cracks," he murmured to himself.

The first page was faded completely. Inside, the dim lines read clearly enough to make sense. As he read his heart slowed his beat. He was reading a note addressed to some one who was being threatened with death unless she renounced the love she held for another. It was a brutal letter, written by a man seemingly beside himself; and at the end was the name Ellar.

Morgan read the note again and his mind became calm. Erna had come here with the man she loved, to be followed by a man who loved her enough to slay her if he could not have her.

A noise stiffened Morgan. He looked up to see a man coming in the yard and greeting him with a smiling, "Hello, I didn't expect to see anyone here at the end of the earth. I am thinking of buying this place—like to fish and hunt here. Hope you are not on the same errand?"

The eyes were keen and cold but kind, and the stranger's smile was winning. Soon Morgan found himself in pleasant conversation with him.

"Well, I certainly don't want the house, but I intend to try the place and raise the house from top to bottom. I guess that will wipe out the story for good," he said quietly.

Morgan started to tell him of his find in the summer house, but decided to avoid spoiling the man's pleasure to the site he was buying.

The conversation drifted about until the stranger rose and said he would ride back to the village as he had a saddlehorse tethered in the grove. As they parted he handed Morgan a card, and at the same time invited him to come up the next autumn for a hunting trip.

Morgan slipped the card into his pocket; then carelessly drew it out and read with a sense of shock that made him reel—"John Ellar."

Morgan stared in the direction the man had gone, then at the card. "He came here to clean up everything to make sure nothing would ever appear against him; but here it is—hidden in a moment of fear by that poor girl. There sure is a watcher in the shadow. Now I must get everlastingly busy!"

Six months later the long arm of justice had claimed its own. Morgan watched the case develop. Patiently the net had been woven about the cool murderer. He had fed the country after the murder, while money, returned after safety seemed assured, planned to buy the property to make sure no evidence would ever appear against him. Had done all a man could do to wash the stains from his past only to have a faded note speak volaciously from the ruins of the girls beloved home—a girl faithful to one she loved even in extremity, and dying because of that love.

Exchange Club Makes Progress

Many Suggestions Being Received By Exchange Club For New Movement

The committee on Farmington Exchange Club committee appointed last week to investigate possibilities of an apple festival and other means of exploiting Farmington's outstanding product, reported that a start had been made, at the Club luncheon Wednesday. It is expected that a number of apple-growers will gather information with the committee within the coming week to discuss the idea in a general way and exchange opinions.

It is generally agreed that the working up of a complete and successful movement will require considerable time, and the consensus of opinion appears to be that efforts should be directed to next year, rather than attempting anything this fall, with the limited time remaining. It is feared that anything that might be done this fall be too hastily prepared, and possibly do more harm than good to the movement.

A large number of suggestions have been made and are being discussed. Much interest was evident throughout the community following the announcement last week. The ideas put forth will be considered and utilized after preliminary work is accomplished.

This show was of outstanding interest with a good assortment of flowers in exceptional quality in spite of a bad season.
