HISTORY'S MYSTERIES

Unsolved Riddles That Still Puzzle Authorities Here and Abroad

The Polish Beauty

WHILE the dual role of a male and female character has been successfully played only upon a few occasions—notably in the cases of the Chevalier d'Eon and Dr. James Barry, the British Inspector general of hospitals—those who have succeeded in impersonating both sexes have thrown around themselves such an aura of mystery that it is difficult to determine whether they should be alluded to by the masculine or the feminine pronoun. Nor is the day of the sex-impersonator confined to the past years, as is evident from a study of the career of one of the most unusual characters of modern history—Mlle. Raczniewicz or M. de Reylan, as this personage is alternately known.

It was during the closing years of the last century that word began to be passed around the underworld of international diplomacy that one of the particularly bright lights of the Russian consular corps was a certain "Monsieur Nichol de Reylan," confidential secretary to Baron Schlippenbach, a young man of extreme charm and marked ability in his chosen field.

By day, there was nothing mysterious about M. de Reylan. The young man went about his duties with an attention to detail and a most commendatory zeal for the service of his imperial master. But little by little, it began to be noted that wherever M. de Reylan made his appearance another character—his direct antithesis—also was to be seen.

This was none other than a beautiful young girl, who went under the name of Mlle. Raczniewicz, supposedly of Polish parentage and a most assiduous worker in the cause of anarchical "freedom." Never visible during the day, this siren snatched the major portion of the night in working out secrets which were held by the members of the foreign diplomatic corps and in furthering the preparations for the plot which was destined to culminate in the final overthrow of the Romanoffs.

Months passed without the slightest breath of suspicion connecting M. de Reylan with the Polish beauty. Each came and went in their own circle and the keen eyes of the revolutionists, as well as the constant watchfulness of the imperial envoys, was deceived by the masterly manner in which this remarkable personage played his—or her—cards. For, impossible as it may seem, Mlle. Raczniewicz and M. de Reylan were one and the same, not playing a single role as did Doctor Barry, but a double and far more dangerous one of cross-purposes and counter endeavors.

One has only to visualize the Polish spy, bound by oath to an everlasting hatred of everything pertaining to royalty, seated in the confidential conferences conducted by Baron Schlippenbach and taking note of all the measures which the czar's envoy was launching against the nihilists, to sense the extreme peril in which the Polish beauty moved every moment of her daily impersonation. Or, granting that M. de Reylan was the true character of the strange pair—for it has never been definitely settled whether it was a man or a woman who conducted the dual characterization which spread over more than ten years—a vision of the secret meeting places of the Russian Reds, betrayed by this intrepid investigator in the guise of a woman, comes immediately to mind.

Unfortunately, however, the plans of this strange Jekyll-and-Hyde were to be upset by something which had been entirely unforeseen—the ravages of tuberculosis which, in 1905, made it necessary that de Reylan (or Raczniewicz) retire to Arizona where he (or she) died in 1906, still retaining the secret which had been successfully concealed for so long a time.

Was the spy a man or a woman? Was "he" in the service of the czar or the revolutionists? Where did "she" come from and how did "he" acquire the ability to alter his voice, his appearance and apparently his sex at a moment's notice? These are questions which are buried forever beneath the same which, in the heart of Arizona, marks the last resting place of one of the strangest and most unusual characters in history—ancient or modern.

Artistic Chinese

The Chinese, more than other races in the world, use their hands—scoring machinery and other man-made upplances—and it is strange to note that from no other country in the world come such intricate designs, such delicate carvings, and such beautiful workmanship as from this country of hand-made articles. But then the Chinese has long since learnt the art of patience and perseverance—and without these qualities handwork is an impossibility.

Bell, Makers' School

The "first bell founders' school" in the world has been opened at Brilon, Westphalia, in connection with the Humpert bell foundry, which has been renowned since the Middle Ages. Here, therefore, the art of bell-making has been the possession of a comparatively limited number of persons and the occupation has been kept mainly in the same families for centuries. Both theoretical and practical instruction will be given at the new school.

Rainfall

The weather bureau says that condensation centers, or nuclei, are essential to the formation of clouds, and therefore of rainfall. These nuclei may be dust particles, especially of certain kinds, such as sea salt, or even, it is believed, molecules of certain sorts that have great affinity, as we say, for water. The air always contains an abundance of such nuclei, so that adding more dust to it neither increases nor decreases the probability of rain.

In the Canadian western provinces the wooded area, north of the prairie, is well stocked with moose, deer, bear and caribou.
