The New Conception

From the northern part of the state comes the story of workers in a reforestation camp waging a successful battle against forest fires. That is good news. Not only is the nation engaged in the work of growing trees, but also in preserving those we already have. That part of reforestation work should be encouraged. Protecting what we already have will make better forests. It will make many of the forests more pleasant to travel in, more beautiful to look upon. Another good effect of the work in the wood will be the rehabilitation of the young men who work there, young men who are just as important as trees. The most important effect is that the stress in forestry is now on the saving of trees instead of the cutting of them. For generations the American people looked to their forests for lumber, two-by-fours, telephone poles and paper. Now we regard a tree as a creation of Nature, a thing to be cherished and protected, not for its material value, but for its many elements of pleasure and grandeur. From out of the woods comes a new conception of beauty and worth of the tree primeval.

The Pleasant Hour

(Ohio State Journal)

Front-porch visiting, where neighbors gathered and enjoyed the company and chat of each other during the pleasant twilight hours of a summer evening, was one of the pleasant social customs that disappeared with the coming of the motor car, hard-surfaced highways, development of country clubs and other play places.

To learn how completely front-porch visiting has been cast aside, try to recall how long it has been since you observed such a party in progress. It was a delightfully pleasant custom which helped neighbors to become better acquainted, but the law of progress sent it out of the picture almost overnight.

That distinguished Hoosier writer, Meredith Nicholson, said in a recent talk in his home town that the front-porch visiting cult had a custom that was vital to the individual and the community, and nothing to take its place was provided when it disappeared. He felt that in his home town, where the pleasure and benefit of visits were known and appreciated, it might be worth while to make an effort to restore the front porch to its historic use for visiting.

A Life-Line To Life

To the uninitiated outsider, the accomplishments of the modern tuberculosis sanatorium are nothing short of miracles. To the initiate, they are still miracles, but quite understandable ones.

By contrast with the one-time concept of the tuberculosis hospital as a place where a defensive, passive fight against tuberculosis was waged, today's sanatorium is the scene of an active offensive battle. Rest, fresh air, and good food are still provided for patients, but these treatment fundamentals are aided by remarkable developments in the field of chest surgery. According to the Michigan Tuberculosis Association, the sanatorium doctor no longer waits hopefully for results that may or may not be achieved by the forces of nature and the goodness of providence. He steps in as needed with truly remarkable operative measures that bring positive rest to sick lungs, stop the spread of disease, and insure recovery.

The promise of the tuberculosis sanatorium today is one of speedy return to health to the vast majority of cases, and of a vastly increased chance for recovery to advanced cases. The patient who refuses to take advantage in a Michigan sanatorium is as foolish as the person who refuses to accept a life-line from a sinking ship.

The Little Town

(Detroit Free Press)

'Social consciousness in this Nation is largely city consciousness; not many think to praise the serene and leisurely virtues of the rural community. As Odell Shepard, in his "Harvest of a Quiet Eye," remarks, the United States "supports the little town with the amused tolerance that an ogre might be imagined as feeling toward its prey." Being the product of generations of careful selection, having withstood commercialism for many years, it has of course a strange look to us. And yet, he goes on:

No other thing is so natural and yet so human. Besides its merely natural beauty drawn from dust and dew, the little town wears a look of homely paths that has grown upon it through many years of human joy and grief. The hands are the dust that planted its lofty trees; its door sills are hollow from the tread of feet that stepped long ago over another threshold. The mark of its identity to fact, unwavering belief in moral cause and effect. Charity is not impeded by any uncertainty as to who is one's neighbor. Social civility of folly and wickedness is immediate, inevitable, direct. Nearly all that America stands for is implicit in its government, ideals, and daily routine.

Man instinctively seeks to praise the things which serve him best. So it is as long as the roaring gigantism of metropolitan life furnishes him with an ever increasing flood of material rewards, the city dweller controls his wilderness and resolutely adds to the tribute to bigness and speed. But when the torrents of plenty dry up, when there no longer enough and more to go around, many, as the last few months have shown, turn again to the quiet backwaters of existence, sure in the knowledge they have had all along that there, if anywhere, one may see life steadily and see it whole, at last.

The New Deal

(Ionia County News)

Congress has finished its labors and gone home, leaving President Roosevelt behind to do the rest of the work for relief for the nation so gigantic as to stagger the imagination.

Just 104 days after being called in special session our national lawmakers were able to agree on plans of relief that will be used in the titanic struggle to get America back on its feet. President Roosevelt has been granted powers, the extent of which no other ruler of a nation has ever had. But the American people have faith that he will use these powers with great judgment and care for one purpose—to bring back prosperity.

Great powers have also been delegated to industry. It has been made a working partner with the government. Business has been asked to lend its assistance by and paying more than a living wage to its workers. It has been placed on its honor and it must not fail.

The new deal is at last under way and every American citizen must do his part.

The Public School

National safety depends on national vigilance. A strong and virile Americanization can only be secured by a strong and virile people. Self-reliance is more important than wealth. A nation is rich or poor not because of the material resources it has today, so much as the human resources it has for tomorrow. That is why I am more interested in the health of the nation than in a million school houses in America, today, than in the bank clearings of Wall Street yesterday.
