Michigan Only Apple State With Good Crop

Michigan is the only large commercial apple state east of the Mississippi River which has better than an average crop this year, according to a report from the Michigan Co-operative Crop Reporting Service at Lansing. As a result the growers of this State are harvesting a larger percentage of the total United States production than in any year since 1920.

While the total or agricultural apple crop of the nation is slightly larger than that of 1932, the commercial production promises to be about 4 per cent less, according to the Michigan Co-operative Crop Reporting Service. This places the quantity available for fresh consumption at about 15 per cent below the 5-year average amount.

Last season 61 per cent of the total United States crop was rated as commercial. This year only about 56 per cent will be utilized since apples have suffered severely from insect and disease damage, particularly in the eastern states. Lack of adequate washing equipment in some sections necessitated the elimination of late sprays and the codling moth has taken a greater toll than usual. In addition, some of the important apple areas of Virginia, Maryland, and Pennsylvania suffered severely from a tropical storm late in August. Wind damage to the crop in these sections was serious and much of the fruit was injured to such an extent that it was diverted to cider mills and canning plants.

In Illinois, summer apples were a fair crop, but prospects on late varieties have continued to decline. While the commercial production in that state will be better than in 1932, it is still 37 per cent short of the 5-year average for the years 1926-30. The commercial crop in Ohio is also below average, but in Missouri where the 1932 production was exceedingly light, the outlook is considerably better.

Of the western apple states, only Idaho and California place their prospective 1933 production above the average amount for the five years preceding 1931. The excess in both states is small. Washington, the leading apple state of the Union has a commercial production about 18 per cent below average while in Oregon the crop is more than a half million barrels short of the 1926-30 average.

It is sometimes difficult to determine just what course to follow because we get so much voluntary advice. For instance, three or four years ago, when everybody apparently had plenty of money, we were persistently urged to save it. Now, when everybody is hard up we are advised to spend freely. "Buy now" is the slogan. What with?
