THE pungent, sweet odor of frying crullers tantalized Phyllis through the half-open door. "Oh," she said, to the pleasant, efficient looking woman standing there, "if you will just let me leave this triangle with you, and promise me to try it, I'll be so glad." She smiled, a pink, radiant smile as she handed the older woman a little package of cereal. "The children will love it for breakfast and supper—just the thing to give them before those delicious crullers." "Small," she said, and she nodded and turned away. But, "Oh!" she exclaimed, and winced with pain as she started down the porch steps.

"Are you hurt?" Phyllis called down on the top step. "Only my lastest—it's swollen—see! And every now and then it gives such a sharp twinge, I can't help—"

"You poor thing," said Cella sympathetically. "You come right back to the house and rest."

"I'll call a taxi," said Phyllis, "to take me to the hotel—we're staying there. I may use the telephone."

"You'd do nothing of the kind. You can call your friends at the hotel—the town boasted only one hotel. If you want, but you must rest here. It's half past four now. John will be home in an hour, and we'll have supper at six, and he can drive you over after wards."

Phyllis' heart-felt protests were of no avail.

"You're awfully good to me, Mrs. John—"

"Oh—Celia Burke."

"I'm Phyllis Parker. You see, we're doing this part of the state and Harrisville is a good center and not expensive. There are ten of us who go around for this company distributing samples—six girls and three men and our manager, Mr. Sanford Trask. We have a couple of cars and we go off for the day to nearby towns, and then when we've finished this section we move on. I think there's something the matter with my instep, maybe—I dropped a heavy case of samples on it the other day, and it's hurt ever since. But, of course, I can't stop working unless I'm laid up."

Celia sensed fatigue in the younger woman's words.

"Now that's all right. You just rest, and have supper—you wouldn't be doing much more tonight, and you'll feel better tomorrow."

At five-thirty John came home, hesitated when he saw the girl asleep on the couch in the parlor, and tip-toed to the kitchen. There Celia explained to him. She found Phyllis awake when she went to the living room five minutes later, with real tea brimming over. "I can't tell you I'm such a goose," said the girl. "It's so nice being cared for." And by the time Phyllis had dried her eyes and John had been introduced to her, and he, not her husband, the knocker sounded. It was Mr. Trask, a pleasant, middle-aged man, all concern at the message that Celia had telephoned the hotel. Far too pleasant, thought Celia, to direct a pretty girl like Phyllis.

"But Miss Burke," he said contritely to Celia, as he shook her hand, "I didn't know Phyllis had hurt her foot. Why didn't you tell me and see a doctor—do something to get it fixed up?"

"Oh, Mr. Trask," protested Phyllis, "it wasn't really anything, only it hurt a good deal. But this evening, when it seemed to get worse, and then—"

"Never mind," he said. "We'll see a doctor tonight, and then when we go on tomorrow maybe we can let you here for a rest and send you home next week when we come through again. Get a hospital here, Miss Burke? Poor Phyllis is having all the bad luck this trip."

Celia quickly reconstructed her opinion of Mr. Trask. "Yes, we have a hospital. Not very big, but it's all right. But Phyllis is staying here, if you'll let her. I want her here for my guest for a week. We'll get the doctor to strap the foot or whatever it needs, and she can have a few days of rest and get it all straightened out again."

Phyllis, in a week's visit, had quite recovered. But during the following month she and Sanford Trask had been at the Burkes' for supper many times. Sanford had found Harrisville a good center for much of their work. And, at the end of the month, anybody with half an eye could have seen which way the wind was blowing. Sanford Trask and the older sister, Phyllis Parker and John were on the porch, where the first spring warmth made the evening mild and gentle. "Of course, I'll marry you, John," Phyllis was saying. "And I'll marry you, I'll do something else—we'll go to a city and live at a hotel." "But, John, I love it here—Celia won't mind. I want to learn to bake beans and make crullers."

In the living room where wood cracked on the hearth—for in spite of the spring mildness there was a chill in the air—Celia said, "But, of course I'll marry you, Sanford, if you want me." And Sanford answered, "If you'd hate traveling with me, Celia, I'll give up that work and settle down here." "Oh, Sanford, I'll love to go about from place to place," answered Celia. "I'd like never to cook another cruller or make another pot of beans—if only John, can get along without me."
