STRESSES BUSINESS USE OF TELEPHONE

Magazine Writer Notes Efficient Practices Which Help in Daily Contact With Others by Wire

The subject of telephone conversations is given considerable attention in a recent issue of the magazine System and Business Management.

"A really good business man or woman," says the article, "knows how to use the telephone properly. Just notice how your best executive uses his telephone and you will see the difference. He does not answer his ring by a fatuous 'Hello.' He says—'Sales Department, Jones speaking.' In a decent, courteous manner, and from this point on carries on his conversation in a normal and courteous tone.

He always assumes that the other party's time is as valuable as his own and consequently does not unduly prolong his conversation. On the other hand, he is never short to the point of brusqueness—simply business-like. He never quarrels or argues over a telephone."

The writer enumerates a number of rules which will help business people in the use of the telephone, such as the necessity of being absolutely sure that the right number is given, to give complete information in answering a call, to be courteous, to speak clearly, to take notes while talking if necessary, and to give undivided attention to the conversation.

Another point often ignored, says the author of the article, is that telephone conversations in offices are usually overheard by one's associates, and the impression of one's ability can be made or marred by the manner in which he or she represents the organization in the handling of telephone conversations.
