Fox Hound's Fine Sense

of 'Smell Puzzles Hunter A mystery to all hunters is how a hound, striking the track of a for in the night, can determine in which direction the fox was running, but any good fox hound can do that and do it merringly. It is not by any impetit of the for's paws upon the ground, for fox hound will unravel that mystery when the ground is frozen and when not even a microscope could find the trace of a track. It is done by the sense of smell, but how? Some contend that the dog muzzles around on the ground until be locates the position of the four-tracks and can rell by their relation to each other in which way the fox was going. Others think the hound has such a fine sense of smell that, even an hour after the fox has passed, the hound can distinguish the strike of the sense of smell that, even an hour after the fox there the paw the hound can distinguish the strike of the strike of the sense of

be, a dog, finding a trail, will nose around to it, thrusting his muzzle first of Smell Puzzles Hunter

Whatever that mysterious sense may be, a dog, finding a trail, will nose around in it, thrusting his muzzle first in one invisible track and then in another, making short, quick dashes this way and that along the trail, but soon, as sure as fate, he discovers which way the fox was traveling. Then he polots his nose to the sky and utters a long, quavering, blood-siltring cry that comes across the fight in triumphant confidence.
