He Didn't Forget

FOR twenty-five years the annual ball at the Wildcat School for Girls has been the big event of the season for the girls of the school. The ball is held in the gymnasium of the school and is a most successful affair.

Tonight the college was in readiness for the colossal event. At her window at the far end of the second floor hall Fran Marshall, teacher of English and literature, sat looking over the rolling campus bathed in a soft silver moonlight. Twenty years ago, she had been a girl of Wildcat and had been thrilled at the prospects of the annual ball.

She, too, had had her party dress—a white voile with lace-edged ruffles around the bottom.

And it was twenty years ago tonight that she had danced with a young man over the campus until the wee hours of the morning, and Fran Marshall had danced in line dances with the tall blond cadet in blue; had walked with him both the day and the night, and eaten her ice cream and cake with him behind the palms in the gymnasium.

He had liked her white dress, but most of all, he had liked her emerald earrings—long slender pendants set in dull gold, falling almost to her shoulders. He had said emerald green was his favorite color. And he had kissed her that night and said he would come back.

Fran never left Wildcat. Following her graduation, she had been placed on the faculty. And she was willingly tolerant of the whispered consultations long after the quiet ball had rung.

They were young, and only once . . . she argued to herself.

She moved to her dressing table to arrange her hair, when a dark shadow of girl came in, radiant in a chiffon dress.

Peggy Thompson was the school's peopplest girl and rules meant little to her. Fran knew of the happy-go-lucky father who was seldom home long enough to get acquainted with his lovely, motherless daughter. Peggy showed letters from Africa, Asia, Central America, and recently, from Egypt.

"I thought I'd find you dressing for the dance, Miss Marshall. Sam is here, and I don't know what to do with him."

"Sam?" queried Fran. "Which one of the avarins is Sam?"

"Sam is my father. He landed in New York this morning."

"Oh, I am glad he is your father. I thought it might be another child. Part it in the middle and coil it up on your neck. Please . . . now . . . And you should have earrings."

Fran Marshall smiled at herself in the mirror as hour later. Her usual curly black hair was softened over the ears and coiled low on her neck. Her dress was white, a lovely soft silk thing she had bought in New York. For Fran always wore a white dress.

As she looked at the other members of the faculty, Peggy Thompson smiled and came across the door holding fast to the hand of a big blond man.

"Miss Marshall, Sam. And Miss Webster, this is my father."

He looked straight into Fran's eyes, a questioning gaze. He smiled at her as he took her hand in his, and with the other hand, he touched an earring that nearly reached to her shoulder.

"Earrings of emerald . . . a white dress . . . Wildcat . . . and those twenty years are bridged. I would have known you anyway, but the emerald really gave you away."

"I can't tell you, twenty years ago, but you had not given me your name! I couldn't find you, but I never forgot."

"For the love of Mike, Sam, what are you talking about? I don't know you."

"I mean, young lady, you can save a dance for your old dad along about the last. I will be busy up to that time. Here comes your young Lochinvar in blue. Just as I came, twenty years ago. Run away, my dear, and we'll see you later."

Peggy Thompson came into Fran Marshall's room. Big after the last guest had gone. She snuggled down in the big chair beside the window.

"I don't know what it is all about, Miss Marshall, but Sam and I are ever so happy. Someone's lecture us and I'm even glad that every person doesn't wear emerald earrings . . . if that is what made Sam fall for you tonight."

"Now, think! I don't know what if he hadn't seen your first . . ."

"But he did, Peggy. He saw them first twenty years ago . . . and he didn't forget."

States Had Presidents

Chief executives of Delaware, New Hampshire and South Carolina were known as presidents under their first constitutions. South Carolina changed the title to governor in 1778 and Delaware and New Hampshire followed suit in 1782. A chairman of the Pennsylvania executive council was addressed as president from 1776 until 1784. Texas was an independent republic with a president at its head when admitted to the Union in 1845.—Pittsburgh Magazine.

"A Year and a Day"

Many arrests are for misdemeanors only, and carry sentences of less than a year. In order to be classed as a felony an act for which a person is arrested must carry a charge of more than one year. It is for this reason that many arrests consist of "a year and a day," the minimum sentence for such an offense. A person convicted of a felony can not hold federal office except by Executive clemency.

Statue of Aphrodite

A statue of Aphrodite was recently dug up in Athens. The figure was carved in the Fourth century B. C. Agora excavations also reveal a bare ancient room with a well and senate dining room.
