Doe Deer Produces 11 Fawns in 5 Years

Eleven fawns in five years! That's the record of a doe deer in the tourist park at Newberry.

The achievement of this doe in beginning to attract the attention of wildlife students of the state. It became a resident of the park little more than five years ago and when two years old produced its first fawn, a set of twins, in 1931.

Since 1931 the Newberry doe has had 11 healthy fawns, eight of them males and three of them females. It has given birth to twin fawns every year, except 1933 when triplet fawns were produced, all males. In 1932 the doe brought forth male and female fawns; two male fawns in 1934 and now is rearing the fourth set of twin fawns, a male and female.

Where Friendship Ceases

"That's her!" rumbled Big On Measley, raising a huge arm to point across the bay flitter of the dance floor.

Fruitee Pruitt swung his one hundred and forty pounds upon the big arm and pulled it down. "Civilized people," he admonished, "don't point. And they don't say 'That's her'." Then he tried to look in the direction the big man had indicated. "My savage protegee desires the paleface medicine in big gulps!" he blurted softly as his eyes lighted upon a glorious blond.

"Cut the kidding and start calling signals for my play," the giant urged.

Fruitee shook his head sadly. "Start calling signals for your play! Just look at that! Big On, the play hasn't been doped yet and he's carrying a man across that goal line!"

"Something in his tone caused Measley to glance down quickly. "Has she thrown you for a loss, too?" he asked.

"Every Romeo in school has tried to teach her," Fruitee responded lightly. But his disimulation did not deceive the big fellow.

"If she's your girl, that lets me out," he stated decisively.

Fruitee dropped his air of mock modesty. "Big On, that went so badly for me. I'm going to call your play to-night and give you an even break. Then let the best man win. That girl has seen hundreds of men like me. And there's only one man in the world like you. Your play is to be yourself and not try to imitate."

The David and Goliath act had been introduced at State university a half dozen months before when Fruitee had crouched between the legs of the big center who had handed the ball back to him and ploved ahead, with the little quarterback following between the protecting legs.

A month later Measley had marveled, "You certainly can run interference on this path astute!" "Concentration is the secret," the little man had snapped. "Jam your nose back into that book, and keep it there." Examinations, which would determine eligibility for the basketball team, were due the following day.

Measley's father had gone West when land was just something between a man and where he wanted to go. When Measley came to State he could read a cattle brand a half mile away better than he could read snail symbols under his nose.

Fruitee was from a long line of lawyers who spared enough time from acquiring culture to garner their share of the coin of the realm.

Their net drew more applause when the big man tipped the basketball to the little one, who dribbled it in dazzling circles until the other was in position for him to pass for a score.

Measley was on hand to catch Fruitee when he staggered after breaking the tape in the hundred-yard dash and the little fellow juggled the lumbar and the big shot to the ring for the point.

By now the students generally referred to them collectively as David and Goliath.

Then the two three-letter men were ready to break training. "It's time you were getting civilized, you woolly son of a West," Fruitee had declared. "Have a dress suit ready for the top tomorrow night, and I'll break you for society."

The mentor decided the following evening that Measley's first course of introduction should be to leave him on his own with a group of girls to whom he had been introduced. But it was not long before the big one came seeking the little one to declare, "Half-pint, I've found the girl who makes all this fuss worth while. Come on. I'll show her to you. I want an introduction."

That had led up to the conversation which carried the two to the cent room. "Stand still," Fruitee ordered, while he pulled Measley's tie around to the front. There were sundry adjustments before the final survey and he murmured, "Well, that's the best I can do. We'll go find her. And remember, after the introduction it's every man for himself."

"I wouldn't do it if it were any girl except that one," the giant apologized. "Can't we still be friends?" "Sure," snapped Fruitee. "Damon and Pythias were—in the book. It's a pretty story. Better read it!" Fruitee sought the largest group in the big hall and dashed Measley to its center. He performed the introduction gracefully and added, "My best friend, and the finest fellow who ever came to State." Then he turned to leave.

He was halfway across the room when he was roughly seized from behind. Measley wrapped his left arm about the little fellow and jerked him about. As Fruitee looked up into the grin face above him, the giant growled, "You fumbled with your damn politeness." He held Fruitee powerless, while his long arm came up to point openly and defiantly at a girl with a sheaf of dark curls above saucy eyes. "That's her!" he said again.

BEAUTY HINTS

(By Hazelle)

Swimming, while it is done chiefly for pleasure, is the most beneficial exercise known because it brings into play all the muscles of the body. In addition to furnishing exercise, swimming develops grace and is an effective method of reducing provided one does not overeat to satisfy his appetite which this form of exercise will work up.

Swimming will develop the bust, aid the complexion, overcome sluggish circulation and will be instrumental in relieving nervous conditions.

In order to derive the advantages which swimming affords, it is necessary that you attempt all of the popular styles. This will bring into play all of the muscles, thereby making them firm as well as taking off excess weight on the hips and on the legs.

Everyone should keep healthy by learning to swim.

Question: I am 16 and anxious to bleach my hair. What would you recommend I use?

Answer: "Please do not bleach your hair. I visualize you a beautiful young lady with lovely skin and beautiful hair. Don't spoil that picture. You are now at your loveliest and you must remember bleaching your hair will give you a false appearance which boys do not like. Write and tell me you have changed your mind.

The Word Sarcophagus
The derivation of the word sarcophagus is from a Greek word which means flesh eater. The name originated in the alleged property of a certain limestone of consuming the whole body, except the teeth, within 40 days.
