Relics of the Stone Age Days Are Found in West

Traces of a "Stone age" civilization which apparently prevailed many centuries ago in northern Montana have been unearthed by Prof. H. M. Sayre of the Montana school of mines, writes a Butte United Press correspondent.

Professor Sayre, on a 1,400-mile exploration trip through the northern, eastern, and central sections of the state, found hundreds of circles, 8 to 15 feet in diameter, made of stones. No evidence was obtainable regarding the use to which these circles might have been devoted.

He also investigated long rows of stones 1 to 3 feet high, which in some cases were a mile in length.

It is thought the stones were placed by a tribe that occupied the plains section before the Crow, Cheyenne, and Blackfeet Indians took over the territory. Ancient legends of the Blackfeet referring to a race "that lived without fire," are believed to concern the stone builders.

Professor Sayre also found a giant stone hammer, weighing more than 20 pounds—too large to have been wielded by a man of ordinary strength.

Near the town of Hinsdale, in northeastern Montana, the professor discovered a layer of buffalo bones 3 feet deep and 18 feet wide. The bones lay at the bottom of a steep bluff. Professor Sayre believes this to be evidence of a buffalo hunting ground used for a remote period—so remote it is not even chronicled in the legends of more modern tribes.

It was the custom of the Indians to drive buffalo over a sharp bluff or cliff during their hunting forages, then destroy the crippled animals with bows and arrows.

Electric Magnet Finds Tools

Among the most successful ways of fishing for tools lost at the bottom of an oil well a mile and a half deep is a powerful electric magnet which is lowered into the hole. When contact can be made, the magnet lifts them quickly to the surface. Broken bits, tubing catchers, slips, baller bottoms, and various other metal parts are lost in drilling or later operations and must be recovered or the hole deviated around them. The bigger the hole the larger the magnet that can be used with a consequent greater lifting power. Magnets are constructed from 3½ to 24 inches in diameter. A 9-inch magnet has a lifting power of 1,500 pounds plate pressure. The apparatus is installed in a truck on which is mounted the cable drum.
