

There's a lot to say about Farmington...

...and it takes someone with a lot of Farmington in him to say it.

There's a lot to a community like Farmington, and it takes someone with a lot of Farmington in him to bring it to you . . . someone like Dave Sartin.

Dave was raised in Farmington, schooled at Ten Mile Elementary, then Farmington Junior and Senior High Schools. Michigan State added polish to the words. People-to-people contact selling everything from grasshoppers to paper weights added the meaning.

He's old enough to remember when the best sledding spot in town was ruined by closing the Farmington Hill bridge, and young enough to talk about today's explosive youth with first hand knowledge.

Like many other modern American communities of today, Farmington can change in many ways . . . usually rapid and dynamic.

It's a community of tomorrow. And yesterday. A community of contrasts. An area with a rich past that is reflected in the historic old buildings side-by-side with brand new shopping complexes.

Farmington shows you traces of a horse-drawn past and the new look of the space age. The time-honored activities — teas, parades, public meetings in the park — still go on today. Yet, you are surrounded by freeway cloverleafs, modern new schools, a wealth of rising young executives and new homes.

Dave Sartin brings the essence of Farmington . . . your Farmington . . . to you. Read him every Wednesday and Sunday in Farmington's hometown newspaper.
