Famed Emperor Quickly Sensed Value Of Telephone, Invented 60 Years Ago

Below: The telephone receiver which Alexander
Graham Bell
exhibited at the Centennial Exposition in 1876.

Above: The telephone transmitter which Bell exhibited in Philadelphia soon after he had first successfully demonstrated the transmission of a complete and intelligible sentence by electricity.
Right: Meeting between Bell and the Emperor of Brazil at the Exposition. In circle: Dom Pedro expresses astonishment
as the telephone
"talks."

The telephone was invented by Alexander Graham Bell in Boston and was patented in March of 1876. Bell first publicly exhibited his invention at the Centennial Exposition in Philadelphia that summer. It attracted little interest until Dom Pedro, Emperor of Brazil, who had met Bell in Boston, asked to see what he was showing. Bell gave Dom Pedro a demonstration of how the telephone operated, and the Emperor's famous exclamation, "My God, it talks!" brought it to the attention of the leading scientists of the day.
The instruments pictured above are replicas of the ones shown at the Exposition; the two camera studies are from the motion pictures "When the Telephone Was Young."

Earlier in the year the Brazilian Emperor had made a visit to Boston, and while there, had consulted Bell, who was a teacher of the deaf and already had achieved a reputation for a successful method of teaching the deaf to speak. In Brazil, as in all other countries, there were many deaf children, and the South American ruler was much interested in helping them. In fact, it is said that one of the reasons he went to Boston was to seek out the young Scot, of whose success he had already heard.

A Fortunate Meeting
It was a hot summer day in Philadelphia when the Brazilian Emperor was making a private inspection of the Centennial exhibits. In his party were several men of science, including Sir William Thomson, foremost English scientist of his day, and Joseph Henry, leading scientist in America. Warm and tired after their long tour of inspection, they were about to leave when Dom Pedro chanced to recognize the young teacher of the deaf whom he had met in Boston.

"Why, Mr. Bell, what are you doing here?" was his friendly greeting.

Bell explained that he had perfected a device called the telephone, by means of which he could transmit speech over a wire electrically.
The Emperor was at once keenly interested, asked if he might see the apparatus demonstrated, and was assured that he might.

In the presence of the other members of the party, who were acting as judges of the exhibits and who remained to watch, the unknown Bostonian demonstrated to royalty his newly patented device. Un-knowingly, these scientists were about to witness one of the most dramatic and most important moments in telephone history. Bell showed the Emperor how to hold the receiver to his ear, then himself went away to another part of the building.

"My God, it talks!"
There was a little pause. Suddenly Dom Pedro straightened, astonishment written on every line of his face. "My God, it talks!" he exclaimed in tones of little less than awe.

One after another, the judges of the exhibit crowded forward, now eager to try the apparatus to which such slight attention had been paid.
Until late in the evening they remained, alternately talking and listening. Joseph Henry was among the first to congratulate Bell, while Thomson afterwards Lord Kelvin was loud in his praise.

Thus was telephone history made; the interest and kindness of an Emperor helped Alexander Graham Bell to win for his invention the attention which might otherwise have been long delayed.
