THE SHARKER

By ELIZABETH R. GREEN

WNU Service.

"I S THAT th' dish you got of th' peddler Sarah?" inquired Simon, picking up a plate from the table.

"Yes—it ain't so bad, Si," apologetically.

"Ain't nothin' but tin," asserted Simon, setting down the plate disgustedly. "An' you paid for aluminum! Th' country's full of them sharkers, Sarah," he added loudly, "got 'bout ennsarin' weak-minded women—"

"Humph!" scoffed his spouse. "I guess 'weak-minded women' ain't all they catch!" significantly.

Simon chuckled. "Well, they don't catch me! I see him—"

"Mebbe, an' mebbe not," Simon paused at the door.

"Tell you what, Sarah," he teased, "if one of them fellers ever gets ahold of me, I'll buy you a silk dress!"

"It's a bargain!" agreed his wife. "An' now look out, Simon Potter!"

"Good morning! Mr. Potter?"

Simon, digging potatoes in the south field, looked up, then, seeing the stranger, slowly straightened his aching back.

"I'm Simon Potter," he nodded.

"Glad to know you, Mr. Potter!" smiled the intruder, genially, extending a well-manicured hand.

"Now I'll only take a few minutes of your valuable time," glibly. "I know you're anxious to get the potatoes dug—my, but they're looking fine!" he added. "Turning out well!"

"Fair," admitted Simon, laconically.

"Well, now Mr. Potter, I just want to show you," rapidly unfolding a small leather case, "this book—"

Simon's jaw squared.

"It's no use," he interrupted, grimly. "I ain't got no time for readin'—"

"Why, man," remonstrated the agent, stepping nearer, "next to the Bible, this is the greatest book in the world! It tells all about the human body, how to keep well, how to keep the doctor away—you know how doctor's bills mount up."

Simon nodded, reluctantly, remembering spells of "rheumatism" that had been costly as well as painful.

Here a picture of the human body, continued the other enthusiastically.

"Shows the position of every organ—dye know," he smiled, "most folks think their livers are down under their left lung, when it's right up here," tapping an emphatic finger on the colored chart, now held close to Simon's nose.

"Why, man," impressively, "there's more than 100—100, think of that—standard medical prescriptions here, in Latin and English, worth the price of the book."

Simon stared, with growing fascination, at the colorful pages passing swiftly before his eyes.

When, finally, the canvasser paused for breath, Simon ventured a question.

"How much is th' book?"

"Only twenty dollars—"

"Humph!" grunted Simon. "Guess I don't want it."

The agent drew nearer. "See here, Mr. Potter, you think that's an awful price, don't you, but how far'd twenty dollars go in paying the doctor?" he demanded.

Simon related the spells of "rheumatism" and—wavered.

The other was quick to press his advantage.

"Why, dye know," jubilantly, "I told Mrs. Taylor that her book when she was ten years ago, and she told me today she wouldn't take a thousand dollars for it if she couldn't get another book like this one or there's!" with a flourishing gesture toward a comfortable brown farmhouse, "the name just goes from me—"

"Perkins," prompted Simon, marvelling, for everybody knew that Ezra Perkins couldn't read his A B C's, and that Mandy, his wife, hated books worse'n poison (Mandy's first husband had been a book-worm, you see).

"That's it!" delightedly. "They bought one, and I just sold to your other neighbor—Leighton, Abbie Leighton—on the installment plan."

Simon's eyes widened and his jaw dropped.

Never, in the history of Diamond Center, had Abbie been known to buy anything on "installments."

"Why, man, we don't have to canvass this book," exulted the agent, "it sells itself! Through its pages the people are learning how to do for themselves for every known disease—kidney, heart, lung trouble, indigestion, constipation, rheumatism—"

"Rheumatism! By Japs! If he could get rid of that!"

"Does it tell a cure for rheumatism?" demanded Simon tensely.

"Sure," enthused the other. "Dye know, I know was one of the best things in the world for it! Tells all about it here in this book—ample little remedies you can get right in your own home—"

Simon's jaw squared and he was sealed with a crisp five-dollar bill from Simon's old wallet.

It was furthermore agreed that he, Simon, should bring the rest of the money, fifteen dollars, that afternoon to the "Centre," where the agent was rooming, and receive his book.

At noon Simon strode excitedly into the kitchen.

Sarah noted his jubilant air, but wisely ignored it, as they sat down to dinner.

"Been one of them book agents all this mornin'," she announced casually, helping Simon to cucumbers. But I didn't buy nothin'!" she added. "I remembered how I got took in on them pie plates, an' what you said 'bout peddlers bel' sharkers—"

Simon hitched uneasily in his chair. "I know, Sarah," he agreed, "but I s'pose they ain't all frauds, 's'ome's honest. I kinder liked th' looks of that feller here this mornin'—"

"Oh, then you seen him?" innocently.

Simon pushed back his plate and plucked boldly into his coat pocket. "So I thought, Sarah," he concluded, "th' book'd be a regular bonanza to have in th' house—you know what a sight my rheumatism has cost us. But I dunno's I'd succeed it," he confessed, "if Abbie hadn't bought a book. You've said yourself," he argued, "Abbie never gets beat—"

Sarah smiled wisely.

"I'm payin' cash, down for th' book," continued Simon, "but Abbie's buyin' hers on installments. What dye're think of that?"

"I dunno," answered Sarah calmly, beginning to pile up the dishes, "that you're an awful deluded man, Simon Potter."

Simon rose majestically. "Well, I'm glad I've got some faith left yet in human nature!" he retorted hotly. "I wouldn't be distrustful folks, like you, Sarah, for a good deal—" and the slamming door marked Simon's exit.

Some hours later he returned from town, carryin' a huge package. "Here 'tis, Sarah!" he cried exultantly. "I swan, it's bigger'n the dictionary!"

Sarah looked up from her knitting to watch her husband unwrap his prize.

The door opened perceptibly, admitting neighbor Abbie. "Got any m'lasses, Sarey?"

"Hello, Abbie!" greeted Simon, jovially. "Got yours yet?"

"What?" demanded his mystified neighbor.

"Why—your book! By fire, Abbie, you an' me can snap our fingers at old Doc Johnson now," he boasted.

"Look at this!"

Abbie, peering quizzically at the ponderous volume, suddenly understood. Simon had got "bit" by the book agent, Simon! Her angular shoulders began to shake.

"What's th' matter?" demanded Simon. "Ain't you book like this—"

"Here's th' m'lasses, Abbie," interrupted Sarah, discreetly.

Abbie took the proffered cup. "I ain't bought no book," she said, dryly, "an' if you have, you need a guardian. Simon Potter, I tell you a sharker when you see him!" and neighbor Abbie departed disgruntled.

Simon dropped weakly into a chair. "By fire!" he whispered, hoarsely. "By fire!"

"Don't be profane, Simon," admonished Sarah kindly. "Mebbe your glasses need changin'; better go see 'bout 'em 't'morrow, an' I'll go along with you," she added casually. "An' pick out that dress—silk's best! now a lot this fall!"

Million Gold in Britain

at $150,000,000 A Year

Britain has a million golfers, including 250,000 women, it is estimated. They are said to spend something like $150,000,000 a year on the sport. At least $25,000,000 is paid in subscriptions. Balls alone cost about $7,500,000, meaning roughly 35,000,000 balls. On clubs and repairs $13,250,000 is spent. Caddies earn $10,000,000. Journeys to and from courses cost $6,000,000, and food $42,500,000, according to a London correspondent.

A first-class woman player who must play as much competitive golf during the season as possible if she wishes to get in line for the international teams, spent about $15,000 a year on the basis of one competition day a week. Men probably average about $2,000 a year.

There are 200 golf clubs in England, of which 200 are in London. Yet despite the relatively high cost of the game, many of the clubs do not pay as well as they should. For some of them members make up a deficit at the end of the year. No club with fewer than 400 members can hope to be a paying proposition for members.

Many golfers have found that a club costs too much, and now play on public courses maintained by municipal and other authorities. These are the most paying propositions in golf in England. Few men earning less than $5,000 a year can afford to play club golf regularly there. It is a 55-a-day sport.

Useless Eloquence

"What a wonderful flow of language your fellow legislator has!"

"Yes," replied Senator Sorghum.

"But he doesn't use it for much except drowning ideas."
