Smart Guy

By ALMEDA F. STERNER

WNU Service.

STEVE MILLER slouched over and sat down abruptly on the hard bunk. His shoulders slumped and he wore overcast as the iron door slammed and the lock snapped shut behind him.

"I'll be bringing your supper soon now," said the big sheriff slyly.

Steve glowered. Whatta break! A smart guy, who'd been around, clucked in the click by a hick county sheriff.

They had dragged him up before the desk and given him their puny version of the third degree. Wanted him to tell on his pal, did they? Steve Miller squeaking? What a laugh that was!

What if he did know something about the Hershey Bank robbery? What if he even knew something about another bank robbery scheduled to take place tomorrow morning? Steve grinned. Thought he'd break down and tell all, did they? The fools! Steve's thin lips curled in a grin. They had been pre-occupied with the false information he gave them they hadn't even missed the heavy glass paper weight when he surreptitiously slid it into his coat pocket.

Mustn't hit too hard—didn't want to get mixed up with murder. Too much risk involved. That was the trouble with his pal, Steve—always too gentle with a gun. Settle nothing to Hunter's Place tonight. God! Jenette was at Hunter's Place now. Jenette of the sweeping black eyelashes and the dare-devil spirit. His own girl waiting there for him—and Spike coming along.

In a frenzy of haste, Steve tore the woolen muffler from his neck and wrapped it about the paper weight. It would soften the blow somewhat. Ah, there was that bulging brute bringing his supper, now—whistling, too.

The sheriff stooped to set the platter of steaming food on a creaky stool, and Steve swung with the paper weight. There was no sound save a dull thud as the heavy body sagged to the floor. Steve stepped over the motionless figure and out into the empty hall.

Selecting a hat from the rack, he pulled it jauntily on, appropriated the evening paper from coat pocket and with a shrug, dropped his overcoat through the partly open door leading to the basement.

Steve walked boldly down the street. He had no way of knowing the shabby man in the pulled down cap who had so lately been lodged in the jail.

The sudden shrill blast of a siren curdled the blood in his veins. He glanced about for a hiding place. There was none. The hand that clutched the newspaper grew clammy and cold but he strode on up the street. Somehow he managed to watch closely as the open police car flashed by, siren screaming. Two men hunched low in the seat let their gaze pass negligently over Steve.

It was beginning to grow dark as Steve approached the highway. If he could pick up a ride, he might still make Hunter's Place before Spike.

His breath came faster as he took the familiar pose at the roadside, mechanically smiling face turned toward the rapidly approaching car, right arm held up, thumb jerking forward. His head cocked hopefully but the car rolled by in a cloud of dust. Steve smote his hands together in blind rage, but his feet automatically began to carry him down the road.

Steve Miller didn't give up so easily. There would be other cars along and he'd get the coat one. He had a hunch. Almost always could depend on his hunches. "Yeah, here it comes now."

The driver leaned out. "Want a ride, boy?"

"Yeah," said Steve in his most ingratiating manner.

"Just climb in back," invited the man, opening the door.

"Ah, thanks," mumbled Steve as he stepped in and sat down.

"Well, so here you are, fellow!" said the big man in the shadowy corner of the car besides him.

Steve's eyes bulged. "Why, Sheriff, how—how—" he stammered.

"I'd trouble you for my hat and evening paper," said the sheriff. "We wanted that paper, but the minute we saw you, a hick-birdie don't ordinarily carry a newspaper."

But Steve's mind was not on the sheriff and his quips. There was Jenette, and there was Spike!

"Drive down this side of the county line to Hunter's Place," he said tonelessly. "You'll find a mug there you've been looking for."
