The Hobby Habit

(Exchange)

So many serious thoughts and activities fill the busy days and nights that it is the most pleasant diversion to slip them aside for brief moments and relax with a hobby.

People have the most varied assortment of hobbies which they love. You, perhaps, find contentment with a palette and a few brushes with which to try your skill in picturing nature's beauty. A Detroit woman has a shoe collection of great interest and her friends enjoy searching into strange places for old, curious and famous shoes, so one person's hobby includes others in the thrill of collection.

You know men who love to fashion delicate and craftsmanlike pieces—such as ship models, old clocks and musical instruments. Others display with pride a collection of old runs, Indian relics, birds and bird lore. Frank O. Lowden, of Illinois, who loved to walk in forests of evergreens, developed an extensive planting of coniferous trees on his own farm, and now has a fine example of practical forestry.

If you haven't a hobby, find one, stick with it and develop it. Out of hobbies have grown some of the finest organizations and most philanthropic movements in the world. Sir Baden-Powell dreamed the Boy Scout movement into a world-wide organization.

Engineers for Humanity

(Exchange)

I would pick a man of learning. The subject of breakfast conversation was the Presidency; the narrator was Dorothy Thompson. Readers might detect the style of Sinclair Lewis in the pungent phrases: "A man of authentic learning. Someone who has some time or other gone through serious mental discipline and has got out of it the kind of freedom, courage and wisdom that such mental discipline gives a man. Someone who is also a doer. . . They exist. There is, for example, Mr. Robert H. L. Lewis, of Chicago, at thirty."

Mr. Lewis's personal unification will scarcely go far, so active are the prejudices still aroused by that hasty epithet "brain trust." In the language of politics, thinkers from the academic halls are "unintelligible." And very likely President Roosevelt was not thinking of an engineer for President when he wrote that letter to 100 engineering schools and colleges Wednesday. But he obviously did conceive that the highest order of intellectual, practical and creative thinking was requisite in solving the nation's economic problems. Mr. Roosevelt boldly charged the future generations of engineers through their teachers, to "dig again the deep disciplines" in the national system, caused by the uneven impact of natural science on the community. He mentioned by name unemployment, bankruptcies, and relief. His letter obviously recognized that the swift, erratic entrance of new industries, and displacement of old, created problems of retraining and relocating labor which are quite unsolved. The thinking from which these improvements spring is implied, is surely capable, when appealed to, of protecting society from a reversal of this progress. The teacher and research expert have not been given their due, either in public recognition or effective use of their talents. Doubtless there are countless cloistered thinkers who have not bridged the gap to action. But as the President's letter usefully emphasized, there are pools of original thinking and potential public service in universities and technical schools which are yet largely untapped.

Habit

(Exchange)

If the young growing up could know the power of habit, if they could know how quickly threads of silk become chains of iron, they would give scrutiny to every thought, to every gesture and act. For a habit remains in the end of life either to ennoble or to curse. As the young cannot realize the dictatorial power of habit, adults who do know should restrain, guide and compel children to form right habits.

The child should not be allowed to grow lax. If he is trained to pick up his playthings and his clothes he will grow to be orderly. If he is trained in the doing of unpleasant duties, he will grow up to a life of accomplishment. If he is taught to think of others he will not leave behind him a trail of misery and unhappiness. If he learns to save pennies when young he will save dollars when he is older. If we do not think out every difficult problem for our children they will grow in independence, and originality. If we teach them to look for beauty they will never have to see it through the eyes of another.

These little tiny nerves, running like cobwebs through a child's body, can be welded into golden cables over which he will travel in a life of usefulness to an old age of happiness.

Reapportion Life

(Exchange)

Youth is disproportionate to old age. We have made the period of childhood and youth too short. Years ago a man would die at 50, today he is not, because science has assisted him to prolong life. That man is considered old at 50 is more a usage of terms than an actuality. Even if a man feels as young as he ever did he'll be regarded to the wall and compelled to feel he is by a generation which thinks he is. Society is accustomed to spanning life too narrowly.

Now it seems a good division would be: childhood, 1-25; youth, 25-50; middle age, 50-75; old age, 75-100. After all, we are only children until twenty-five, having learned nothing of life; our youth, the time for beginning our life work follows after 25; then middle life when we begin to enjoy some of the fruits of our labors, is next, and finally old age comes after 75, at a time in life when we are willing to accept it.

Let's keep the world young. Let us not think age before we meet it. And let us make it an offense against humanity to call a man anything but a youth if he is below fifty.

Home Study

One of New York's city schools is doing away with home work. The class periods are lengthened and divided into two periods, the first part for instruction, the second part used to work out the day's assignments. For several reasons this appears to be a good plan.

First, the pupil does his work under supervision—if he meets with a problem he can get it at hand to help him through. He is also working out the next day's work while today's lesson is fresh in his mind.

Second, hours at home, after school and in the evening, can be broadened untrammelled to the study of arts, and enjoyment of wholesome family activities.

Third, if a shorter working day is thought advisable for the adult, why not for the young? Chronic fatigue is no more. To build health for later life the young must not be overworked.

Advertisements Valuable

(Exchange)

Few persons realize the real value of advertisements that appear in newspapers. News is interesting but from an economic standpoint, reading advertisements is worth money to you. They are the messages of progressive merchants offering real values. Many ads carry the news of prices that cannot be duplicated in mail order catalogs. Reading the ads is a thrifty habit. Give them more attention and you'll find your newspaper more valuable to you.

Help Which Is Not Help

(Exchange)

If you chance to be in the neighborhood of an accident ascertain if any messages for help can be sent and then drive on. More often than not people congregating around an accident have complicated conditions rather than improved them. They prevent help from reaching the victim rapidly, and frequently their eagerness to relieve the injured person by adjusting his position will increase the injury. This is particularly true in the case of spinal injuries, when the person is best left exactly in the position injured. An attempt to help such a victim to his feet might result in crushing the spinal cord, causing death or paralysis.
