KENN LOOMIS HARDWARE

Farmington To Play Keego Harbor

This shift in the line-up adds height and weight to the team, both of which features are needed. This combination is being worked hard this week in an attempt to put the team in top form for the Keego Harbor game.

The officials of the game with Brighton were Coggins and Georgia. Walled Lake lost to Keego Harbor 21 to 16 and Milford won from Clarkston 44 to 11.

In the league Farmington, Keego Harbor, and Milford each have one victory to their credit and Walled Lake, Clarkston, and Brighton have lost one game.

Soiled Linen

By MAUDE M. WELCH

C. D. S. Service.

THOSE who wash our soiled linens may learn our deepest secrets.

Della Groves had been taking in washing for 30 years. She was a small, wiry woman with a pleasant weather-beaten face and alert black eyes. And she could tell you a lot about the people for whom she washed. Only Della wouldn't.

And, while only a washerwoman, Della was also something of a philanthropist. People for whom she did washing were always giving her things with a sort of noblesse oblige gesture. Old shoes, stockings with runs in them, shapless hats, faded dresses and moth-eaten coats, kitchen utensils, old magazines and a few ragged books. In fact, the usual sort of thing which people give away to the junk man.

So Della always had an odd assortment of things for which she had no use.

It was only natural in time that down-at-the-heel people should appear at her house, quite as if some one had chalked a mark on her forehead and told her to go and see no one ever went away without a gift he or she could use out of the motley array of things Della always receiving.

But the time came when Della's philanthropy failed in a case where help was greatly needed, and certainly deserved. And for once Della's fertile brain was at a loss.

Melissa was getting married. Melissa was the blond-haired, freckle-faced orphan girl who helped Della with the hanging out. Della never trusted anybody to do the washing or ironing because she always took so much pride in her work. But she told Melissa of old jobs about the place because she was so poor and friendless.

And now Melissa had found a beau and tomorrow she was going to be married. Her boy drove a vegetable truck for a chicken farmer and made all of seven dollars a week. The future looked bright enough.

Only Melissa had set her heart on having a real wedding dress. A pretty one, lace and stuffy. It was the one dark cloud in her rosy dreams. She wanted to look like a bride for her soon-to-be young husband.

Della racked her brain all day trying to solve the problem. The afternoon she was ironing while Melissa hovered about her, looking as alert as a bright-eyed bird for a crumb, for any job Della might deem her capable.

Della pulled a garment out of the sprinkle-down basket, slipped it over the ironing board, and the rumpled damp cloth under her skillful manipulations of the iron soon resolved itself into a dress of delicate peach-pink organdie trimmed with wide Valenciennes lace.

Melissa watched the dress as if fascinated. It was so beautiful! Suddenly Della noticed. She replaced an iron on the gas, lifted up another, spat on it to test the heat, then for a moment she held it in mid-air and stared at the dress with puzzled eyes.

"I'll declare! As long as I've been washing for Mrs. Bunch, I've never seen this dress before! Besides, she's been out of town for three weeks. Just got back yesterday, and the maid's been getting up the wash—just towels and sheets and Mr. Bunch's things. Looks kinda funny. But I know I haven't cut anything mixed. I'm always too careful!"

Late that afternoon Melissa carried the basket of laundry to the Bunch bungalow on top of the hill. The next morning early something happened. Mr. and Mrs. Bunch drove up to the side yard where Melissa was already hanging out, and Della was singing over the wash tubs.

Mrs. Bunch's pale, rather acid features wore a frown. Her husband, a small man, had the pinkish, scared expression of a rabbit. On the back seat of the car lay the peach pink organdie neatly folded just as Della had placed it in the basket.

"Della," Mrs. Bunch fixed her eyes on her sternly, "how did that dress get in my wash?"

Now many years of washing dirty linen had sharpened Della's wit. Besides, she had caught a gleam of something like entreaty in Mr. Bunch's eyes, although apparently he sneezed against the seat and stared nonchalantly in front of him.

Della hesitated for only a moment. Then she broke into an apologetic laugh. "Why, I'm so sorry, Mrs. Bunch," she began more to gain time than anything else.

The frown cleared from Mrs. Bunch's pale thin features. She turned and faced her husband. "So you told the truth after all. It was Della's mistake. And a good thing for you it was, too."

Then admonishing Della to be more careful about mixing the laundry lists in the future, they drove off leaving Della holding the dress in her hand.

So she made her way to the wash lines where Melissa was patiently hanging out.

"Here's your wedding dress," she said,—"a present from Mr. Bunch."
