Earliest Apples Grown

Earliest Apples Grown by the First Settlers
All of the apples grown before 1750 were seedlings from wild stock, asserts a furtier in the Rural New-Yorker. Wild apples, probably including a few selected kinds, were KNOWN IN England before the Purians departed for this country. Seeds from these trees and perhaps young trees, were brought over by the very learly settlers. Before many years apple trees were growned to be a seed of the seeding trees produced fine fruit and, when this was the case, h. supply would be saved for family use, and sclons would be given away to be used in top, grafting other seedling trees that did not bear good trult. In some cases the demand for sclons was so great that the vitality of the original tree was weakened by the case, h. supply would be five and its length of life was to great that the vitality of the original tree was weakened by the case of the seed of the product of the original tree was weakened by the case of the case of the seed of the case of the

From about 1700 a few selected mids of apples of real worth began appear. At first these were quide cal, as there were few means for didespread distribution. Most of earliest sorts were given names, there after the man who discovered means of the called the selection of the town or locality here first grown and distributed.

Gothenburg, Swedish City,
Was Built by Hollandera
When, more than 300 years ago, Gustavus Adolphus commanded the construction of Gothenburg on Sweden's west coast, his main reason was that the country sorely needed a port facing the North sea and the Atlantic ocean. "Here as city shall rise," was his order. And here it rose, modest at first, but growing and prospering through this here it ries, modest at first, but growing and prisopering through the years, writes Frederic Babcock, in the Chicago Tribune.

When Hollanders built they built to last. Soon after the king had issued his command he summoned experts from Holland to lay out a typical seaport, and those experts built Gothenburg just as they would have a town in their own land, making it with canals and straight streets and a large moat.

The moat was transformed into a waterway bordered with trees, and the old wall was removed to make way for an esplanade, but most of the canals remain, giving the city its characteristic appearance, and a strong resultance of the Notherlands.

Gothenburg is Sweden's second largest city, its wide window to the Oldest Varieties of Apples As far as we have been able to ral New-Yorker, the dieset distinct varieties of apples grown in this cointry was the Roxbury Russet, named from the town of Roxbury, Mass, where it was first known and distributed. Beach in his "Apples" of New York," states: "It is generally supposed that this variety orieinated in Roxbury, Mrss, early erally supposed that this variety originated in Roxbury, Mrss., early in the Seventeenth century. Some after, 1649 it was taken to Connecticut. About 1797 it was introduced from Connecticut to Otho. It would seem that the seed must have been prought from England by the very earliest of the Puritans or else the tree grown in this country, would hardly be of bearing age, early in the Seventeenth century.
